THE FLOODS.

Extent of the Damage in Kansas—Great Loss of Life—The Swedish Colony Broken Up by the Floods—Destruction to Property in Iowa.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Saturday, July 3.

A Government contractor, just from Fort Sully, makes the following report: There has been no rain of any account north or west of Sioux City, and but little beyond Omaha, below Council Bluffs. The damage is very great from Phillips' to Craig's Station, or Council Bluffs. The St. Joseph track is under water, and no trains have been run for four days. Captain BUSTLE, of the steamer Mountaineer, reports that he saw the dead bodies of twenty-seven persons taken out. They were the bodies of men, women and children drowned by the sudden rise in the river, overflowing by the flat prairie lands. From every quarter below Kansas City reports come of losses of life and property by the floods. Kansas papers say that a company of Swedes encamped on the Kaw River in temporary shanties, en route for the back settlements, were suddenly engulphed by the late rising of the river. The parties endeavored to escape, and thirteen succeeded, but the remainder, numbering twenty persons, were carried away and submerged in the water.

Advices from Dubuque, Iowa, say a fearful storm passed over the lower part of Clinton County. Fences were swept away like chaff, trees were wrenched out by the roots, cattle, hogs and poultry taken up into the air, carried a great distance and killed. At Malone, a small station of the Northwestern Road, nearly every house in the village was leveled to the ground; one woman was killed and several others severely injured. The damage to property is estimated at several thousand dollars.

STATUES OF WASHINGTON.

The Philadelphia Statue—Preparations for the School Children's Ceremonies.

PHILADELPHIA, Saturday, July 3.

The statue of WASHINGTON, presented to this city by the school children, was to-day placed on a pedestal in front of Independence Hall. The pedestal is of Virginia granite, supplied by the Company of the Philadelphia Working Quarry in Virginia. The statue is of white Italian marble, executed at STRUTHER'S establishment in this city, after the design of BAILEY. WASHINGTON is represented in court dress, his right hand resting on a volume sustained by a column with drapery, and his left on the hilt of a sword. The execution and design are warmly commended. The monument will be unveiled on Monday with appropriate ceremonies, in which the school children will take a prominent part.

This completion of a monument to WASHINGTON by the children appears designed to remind their fathers that they have as yet failed to erect a monument in Washington-square, the cornerstone of which was laid forty odd years ago, and still remains in statu quo, though moneys were collected at that time and invested, and now amount to nearly enough to erect a handsome memorial to the father of his country.

The Boston Statue—Ceremonies of Unveiling the Work.

BOSTON, Mass., Saturday, July 3.

THOMAS BALL'S equestrian statue of WASHINGTON was unveiled this afternoon in the Public Garden. The ceremonies were attended by a salute fired on the Common, and music. Several thousand spectators were present. The statue is of bronze, of colossal proportions, and the critics speak of it as a work of remarkable artistic excellence. Its cost was $42,400.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Reports From the Commissioners—The Condition of the Road and its Needs.

BOSTON, Saturday, July 3.

The Commissioners of the Union Pacific Railroad have made reports to-day at the general office in Boston, of which the following is a comprehensive summary:

WAHSATCH, Utah, June 9, 1869.

To Hon. J. D. Cox, Secretary of the Interior:

SIR: In accordance with the instructions of the Department, dated the 18th of May, 1869, the undersigned Commissioners of the Union Pacific Railroad have examined the thirty-ninth section, extending from the 1,000th to the 1,020th mile-post west from the initial point on the Missouri River, near Omaha, and forward herewith a map, profile and report submitted to us by the chief engineer of the road, showing the alignment and grades, and giving a full statement of the kind and condition of the structure, equipment, &c., which, we are satisfied, are a correct representation of the section. This section is well constructed and ready for immediate service, in accordance with and as requested by section 4 of "the Act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes," and we therefore recommend its acceptance by the Government. Respectfully submitted.

(Signed) G. K. WARREN,
Brevet Major-General U. S. A.
JAMES F. WILSON,
Commissioner,
Members of the Commission.

In accordance with the instructions of the Department, dated May 16, 1869, the Commissioners of the Union Pacific Railroad have examined the section extending from the 1,020th mile post to the 1,085 88-100th mile post, and report on the section extending from the 1,020th to the 1,040th mile post, that the unfinished work will require about $58,450. The Commissioners' report on the section extending from the 1,040th to the 1,060th mile post, that the unfinished work will require about $30,000. The Commissioners on the section extending from the 1,060th to the 1,080th mile post, that the unfinished work will require about $15,000. The Commissioners' report on the section extending from the 1,080th to the 1,085th mile, that heavy expense has already been incurred by the Company in grading this part of the line, and the grades and curves are all within the limit prescribed by the law. To complete the unfinished work on this section will require about $195,500 in reducing the present grades from 116 feet to 80 feet per mile as originally intended, and in filling up the places now occupied by temporary trestles. The location adopted is such that the work done is not lost in changing to the lighter grade. The Commissioners say that, in all other respects, the road is well constructed, ready for immediate service, in accordance with and as required by section 4 of the "act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes;" and, as it has reached that state of completion provided for in the "report of the Board convened to determine on a standard for the construction of the Pacific Railroad," made to Secretary HARLAN, Feb. 21, 1866, approved by him, and furnished to us as a part of our instructions, and as the Company is rapidly, and in good faith, finishing up the incompleted work, we recommend the acceptance of the sections by the Government, and the adoption of the same course toward the unfinished work, as elsewhere on the Pacific Railroad. Respectfully submitted.

Brevet Major-General U. S. A.

Commissioner.

Excitement in Political Circles—Removal of Thirty Registers and New Appointments.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

KNOXVILLE, Saturday, July 3.

There has been great excitement here today in political circles. Governor SENTER removed thirty registers, all of them in counties in East Tennessee. New Commissioners have been appointed, and their commissions were forwarded this morning from Chattanooga. Blank certificates, doubtless, came with them, and the Registers have probably been busy to-day, so as not to be caught by an injunction. The Register in this city was notified today to turn over his books and papers. There are one thousand new voters in this county tonight. An injunction will, doubtless, be applied for in most of the counties. It was expected that STOKES would take more liberal grounds on the suffrage question to-day, in going into Middle Tennessee.

NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

Dispatches From Admiral Hoff—The Late Engagements Along the Nuevitas Railroad—The Seizure of the Lahave.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Saturday, July 3.

The Navy Department has dispatches from Rear-Admiral HOFF, commanding the North Atlantic Squadron, dated Key West, June 19 and 24. They contain no news of great importance. Havana is reported quiet and no apprehensions are entertained of any disturbance.

Some account is given of the recent engagement between the Government troops and the insurgents. The brigade of Brigadier FERRER, which left Nuevitas on the 25th of May to reinforce the troops at Puerto Padre, had returned in a pitiable condition, the cholera having broken out among them. They secured their object, the convoying of a train from Puerto Padre to Las Tunas, in the interior. They were harrassed and finally attacked at La Brenosa. The rebels were repulsed with a loss of eighty men. The Spanish loss was seventy-six in killed and wounded. The insurgents were given credit for bravery and for retiring in good order. There was a report of the intention on the part of the Spaniards to give up the railroad between Nuevitas and Principe. It is still used for conveying troops backward and forward.

The United States steamer Nipsic was at Trinidad de Cuba on June 11. There was nothing new there. American interests were receiving full protection.

The Spanish steamer Fernando Catolico arrived at Nuevitas on June 12, with the English schooner Lahave in tow, having seized her while in tow of another steamer, about fifteen miles from the Cuban coast, between Inaguay and Point Maisi. The schooner's cargo is said to consist of thirteen cannon, two of them 200-pound Parrotts, the others 100-pounders and field pieces; also lumber, powder, cartridges, shells and shot in large quantities, besides other military articles. The Lahave cleared from Boston for Jamaica. Hayti is supposed to have been her destination. The English Commodore and the British Consul-General had protested against the seizure; and the Spanish war steamer had sailed from Havana in company with the Lahave for the purpose, it was rumored, of delivering her to the British authorities at Jamaica.

THE MILITARY ASYLUMS.

Meeting of the Managers at Augusta, Me.—Improvements to be Made in the Different Asylums—Speech of General Butler.

AUGUSTA, Me., Saturday, July 3.

The Board of Managers of the National Asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers met at the Eastern Branch, near Augusta, yesterday. There were present Major-General BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, Ex-Governor FREDERIC SMYTH, of New-Hampshire; Major-General J. H. MARTINDALE, of New-York; General J. S. CAVENDEO, of Missouri; Judge Q. L. BOND, of Maryland; Dr. E. B. WOLCOTT, of Wisconsin, and LEWIS B. GUNCKEL, of Ohio. Reports from the several asylums showed 1,161 disabled soldiers at the Central Asylum at Dayton, Ohio; 23 at the Eastern Asylum, at Augusta, Me.; 196 at the Northwestern Branch, Milwaukee, Wis.; 100 at the Philadelphia Hospital Branch, and several hundreds more supported by out-door relief. The success of the schools established has been gratifying, and the moral and religious improvement of the men more than was anticipated.

The Construction Committee, composed of General BUTLER and Governor SMYTH, were authorized to erect an amusement hall, workshops, engine-house, stable and officers' quarters, during the present Summer.

The Eastern Branch is officered as follows: Governor, Colonel E. A. LUDWICK, of New-York; Treasurer, Captain FOSTER KIMBALL, of New-Hampshire; Surgeon, Dr. J. C. WEBSTER, of Maine; Captain PHILIP WOOD, of Massachusetts, Secretary; Captain GEORGE SCHULER, of Pennsylvania, Steward; and H. F. WOOD, Chaplain.

Last evening the inmates of the Asylum assembled in the chapel for the purpose of listening to some remarks by General BUTLER and others. Some very good music, furnished by the Asylum Band, enlivened the occasion. General BUTLER was introduced to the assembly by Colonel LUDWICK, the Deputy Governor of the institution, and was received with loud applause. He began his remarks by stating that the Board of Managers had given their time and attention to these asylums, of which these soldiers before him were inmates, not from any reward, but to make them happy and contented. He then briefly detailed the rise and progress of these asylums, the power given them by Congress; and in order to correct a misunderstanding that was prevalent, he showed that these asylums were under the rules and regulations of the Articles of War just so far as the managers saw fit to enforce them. "The duties of the managers are," he said, "to see that you are all well clothed and cared for, both morally and physically." In return he claimed that they should obey all rules and regulations. Whenever they felt aggrieved by unfairness and injustice, such complaints would not pass unheeded. He urged upon each and all of them the importance of personal cleanliness, and showed its necessity. He cautioned them against idleness, and stated that opportunities would soon be provided for them to learn trades and to perfect themselves by education to go out into the world to earn their livelihood. He enjoined upon them habits of sobriety, showing them the importance of resisting the temptation of indulging in intoxicating liquors. In the matter of dress he wanted them to wear the uniform of the Union soldiery, and pointed out its advantage, as well as the sympathy, respect and pride it would create. He showed that no country in the world had made such provisions for their disabled soldiers as the United States Government. He wanted every soldier to feel that this was his home, and to assist in improving and beautifying it. These asylums were established to show the gratitude of the country, and he wanted them in peace, as in war, to show that they were the best soldiers the sun ever shone upon. The importance of withholding their pensions until they had learned a trade and went out to support themselves, was next touched upon. In conclusion, General BUTLER urged upon them the importance of doing all in their power to make this Asylum a model institution. He trusted they would take a pride in the matter as to make it a pride to New-England and an honor to the country.

General BUTLER'S remarks were loudly applauded, and the spirit that was manifested went to show that his excellent advice had not fallen upon listless ears.

General MARTINDALE, Judge BOND, Mr. GUNCKEL and Governor SMYTH also made a few remarks on the duties and powers of the Asylum and the duties of the inmates, which were well received.

The Indians having received no supplies and having been repeatedly deceived, are firing into steamboats, driving off stock and threatening death to all the whites.

THE CANVASS IN TENNESSEE.

General Stokes Proposes a Duel in Thirty Days—Governor Senter Willing to Fight at Once.

From the Knoxville Press, July 1.

During Governor SENTER'S closing remarks at Clinton, yesterday, he was "a circumstance" more severe and scathing in his denunciation of STOKES than in any previous speech. The "General's" military record was used pretty much in the way that boys use a bladder, which is puffed out and swelled by the winds it confines within itself. Governor SENTER used it as a football, threw it around among the bystanders, and finally took it between his hands, and, bringing them sharply together, burst it.

When the "bald eagle" rose to reply, he fairly trembled with anger and shame. Raising his long finger and pointing it toward Governor SENTER, he said:

"Fellow-citizens: I have a wife and children whom I should greatly dislike to part from. Yet I tell Governor SENTER I will hold him personally responsible, after the election, for what he has said to-day. If he considers himself a gentleman, I challenge him to meet me after the election, as a gentleman, and we will then see who is the coward, and who the man. I denounce SENTER as a liar, and I am ready to meet him any time after the election."

Governor SENTER, who was sitting immediately in the rear of STOKES, coolly arose and informed STOKES that he was ready to meet him now, or any time agreeable to him (STOKES) previous to the election, but would prefer to settle the difficulty without delay. He therefore invited STOKES to step out on the field in rear of the stand and obtain satisfaction. STOKES replied that he would settle the affair after the election.

Both speakers then intimated that the discussion was closed for the day. SENTER slapped STOKES on the shoulder and remarked, quietly, that he preferred to give him satisfaction without delay. STOKES then replied that he did not mean anything serious, but desired SENTER to understand his desire for a fight as expressed in a Pickwickian sense.

An Old Woman Frightened to Death by Rowdies.

From the Troy Whig, July 3.

Last Tuesday night, between 11 and 12 o'clock, a gang of boys went to "Old Gid Mead's" house, near the burying ground in Glenn's Falls, demanded an entrance, and swore they would break in the door if it was not opened. They supposed that some disreputable girls were stopping there, and wished to find them. Mrs. MEAD told them there was no one in the house but herself and little grand-daughter. The boys continued to throw large stones against the house and door until they so frightened Mrs. MEAD, a woman 69 years old, that she died between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning. Coroner BARNES summoned a jury, and after examining several witnesses a verdict was rendered that Mrs. MEAD came to her death in consequence of the riotous proceedings of J. FREEMAN, THOMAS OGDEN, STEPHEN GUYOTT and others. Sheriff HICKS and Officer ALLEN arrested the accused, and they were brought up on Wednesday evening for examination. The investigation was continued until the next day, when a further examination was waived. GUYOTT was discharged, and FREEMAN and OGDEN committed for manslaughter in the fourth degree.

Death of the Widow of General Worth.

From the St. Augustine (Fla.) Examiner, June 26.

Our whole city was thrown into gloom by the death of Mrs. General WORTH, on the 21st instant. There are few who have ever seen her who can forget the smile of kindly interest with which she greeted all she knew. Here in St. Augustine, where so many years of her life have been passed, she was peculiarly beloved, and the reputation of her distinguished husband, Major-General WORTH, is a sacred part of the history of our State. The deeply afflicted family have the warmest sympathy of all.

AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND.

The Season—Agricultural Topics—Mr. Mill on Woman's Rights—The Poet Browning—Art News—Theatrical Gossip.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, June 12, 1869.

Summer in its glory burst on England with this month of June. Last Sunday was the first hot day, and now the whole country is covered with roses, and the railway carriages are filled with the delicious perfume of the bean fields—not such beans as you know of in America, but the coarse English broad bean, which grows two feet high, with a square, hollow stalk, dark green leaves and lovely white flowers with black and rose markings, and a fragrance like the most delicate ottar of roses. The weather could not be better for all kinds of crops, and for all kinds of outdoor enjoyments. You have only to mount your bicycle and start off in any direction, over hard, level roads, to find landscapes of surpassing loveliness. The newest thing in velocipedism is to train a couple of hounds to help you up the inclines, and increase your speed on a level. The animals seem quite to understand the affair and run as if the —— was after them.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.

If the lecture of President WOOLSEY, rather than the speech of Mr. SUMNER, may be taken as the expression of American opinion, there can no difficulty arise in the settlement of the Alabama question. The British Government and people are more than willing to leave every matter connected with the sale of that steamer to the decision of any impartial tribunal, which would decide: First, whether it was illegal; second, whether the Government is responsible, and third, if so, the extent of the damages. It is all in the smallest sort of a nutshell; but if the American Government sends in a bill of its own making out, presented on the point of a bayonet, and indorsed "pay or fight," that is quite another affair. Money is no object; a few millions more or less can be of little consequence to the British tax-payer. He has only to smoke a little more tobacco or drink a little more beer. As to the proclamation of neutrality, all Europe did precisely the same thing; and Mr. FORSTER considers that it was the right thing to do, and done from good motives and for justifiable ends. The American Government will scarcely ask the Queen of England to apologize for the same act for which it thanked the Queen of Spain.

It is said now that the American critics of Mr. SUMNER'S speech have not done much for the dignity and sincerity of his character as a statesman, while they have been as little complimentary to the discernment of John Bull, who cannot distinguish between the downright earnest demands of a people and the loose rhetoric and bunkum exaggeration of a political charlatan. The idea that the issue of the neutrality proclamation was an unfriendly act is considered as simply absurd, but the Birmingham Post tells us that—

"All reasonable Englishmen are in perfect accord with Mr. WOOLSEY and with all reasonable men on his side the Atlantic. We admit the charge of negligence in the Alabama case, and do not dispute our liability as to damages; and so soon as counsels similar to his become as popular at Washington as those of Mr. SUMNER are alleged to have been when they were delivered, the whole question between England and the United States will be brought to a quick and satisfactory conclusion."

Just so. Only Earl RUSSELL will not submit to be shaken, small as he is, without a vigorous protest. The Messrs. LAIRD have declared that all their proceedings respecting the Alabama were perfectly legal, and quoted the highest legal authorities in England to prove it. The Government confessed that it acted illegally in stopping the Alexander, and paid damages to the owners. No competent tribunal has yet decided that any illegal wrong was inflicted. At the same time England would cheerfully pay a few millions to have it declared, as a part of international law by which all Governments shall be bound in future, that the fitting out of the Alabama, and all similar acts of neutrals, were illegal acts, for which Governments could be held responsible.

AGRICULTURAL TOPICS.

I copy for the benefit of the Farmers' Club, the reports of whose proceedings I read with constant and increasing interest, the following statement of Mr. MECHI, probably the most thorough, practical and scientific agriculturist in England. Mr. MECHI says:

"Fifty-five acres of my wheat sown with one bushel per imperial acre are amply luxuriant, and some portion has required flagging. Three half bushel per acre is also ample in plant, and even the peck an acre promises to yield abundantly. Two bushels of oats per acre and six pecks of barley are almost too thick, some of the latter requiring flagging. One bushel per acre each of oats and barley appears to be all sufficient. High farming and deep cultivation absolutely demand a great reduction from the old quantities of seed sown."

Now if a peck of seed an acre is not only sufficient but better than the usual quantity, what an enormous waste in the usual fashion of sowing millions of acres! It is said that the saving of wheat by making aerated instead of fermented bread would be equal to the entire importation of wheat into this country. However that may be, I am satisfied that all grains are wastefully planted.

And now, as America is the country of great and daring enterprises, I have one to propose to the agriculturists and capitalists of New-York and Brooklyn. It is simply to pump the sewage of the two cities into a reservoir of sufficient heighth, and distribute it over the whole southern slope of Long Island. To do this it will be necessary to have two sets of sewage pipes, one to carry off merely waste water and rainfall, the other sewage proper, containing the richest materials for vegetable growth. In England, where there is generally too much rain, even the diluted sewage of towns has produced grass to the extent of some ninety tons an acre per annum. This grass has been known to grow an inch a day, equal to half a ton an acre, and this without exhausting the manure of the sewage. With such an arrangement, Long Island would truly be the garden of New-York, and drought would be impossible. With sewage Indian corn can be grown in England—at least it did grow last Summer, under this stimulus, at the rate of three inches every twenty-four hours for thirty-three successive days, the ears produced being larger and firmer than the seed corn obtained from America. Here is a mine of gold; wealth work and plenty for thousands. What is wanted is a good engineer, plenty of capital and good management. Sunshine will do the rest.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Mr. MILL has employed the leisure consequent upon his defeat as candidate for Parliament, in writing an essay, just published, on the Woman's Rights question. What he undertakes to prove with all the power of his logic is—

"That the principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement; and that it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality, admitting no power or privilege on one side, nor disability on the other.

The social subordination of women, which has existed always and everywhere, exists now in enlighted countries, he says, as "a single relic of an old world of thought and practice, exploded in everything else, but retained in the one thing of most universal interest." This slavery of the better half of the human race, beginning, it may be, with the fall of man, and to end only with his elevation, Mr. MILL looks upon as self-perpetuating. Women have been brought to consent to their subjection through the demoralization of slavery, so that "each individual member of the subject class is in a chronic state of bribery and intimidation combined"—that the testimony of women themselves on the question is "mostly suborned"—that they have become so brutalized by long habits of submission as even to hug their chains and cling to their enslavers. It requires, therefore, that Emancipationists, the Clarksons, Wilberforces, Garrisons, Phillipses and Mills of the dominant sex, should force freedom upon these besotted slaves, who refuse to rise in insurrection. It may require some vast social convulsion, some civil war, to set them free. But I leave the subject and the book to its proper critics, the editors of the Revolution.

THE POET BROWNING.

Yesterday's Times contains a review of Mr. BROWNING'S poem, "The Ring and the Book," extending to four and a half columns, which is chiefly noticeable for the comparison it makes between the two chief poets of the time, in the writer's estimation—BROWNING and SWINBURNE. For two hundred years in England, it is said, the poet of one generation has been neglected by the next. It continues:

"Thus we see now among those who were young with BYRON, that TENNYSON is often an unread book, SWINBURNE a curiosity, and BROWNING but a name; while the generation to whom TENNYSON has spoken find WORDSWORTH feeble, SHELLEY unreal, SOUTHEY tedious, BYRON extravagant and morbid, and all unreadable. We speak not here of dilletante taste nor of artistic instruction; we speak of the youth of a generation, of the passionate intelligence of a nation. And to go one step further, to stand in the very front of the present, there are those to whom TENNYSON and KEATS are dear, who find BROWNING too hard for them, and behold in SWINBURNE nothing but a confused kaleidoscope, yet whose sons perhaps will turn, or are even now turning, to their more intense and passionate utterance, and find rather in them an echo and a sympathy. . . . In original power and importance, though not in sweetness or intrinsic beauty, this poem of Mr. BROWNING'S must be placed above the works of all other writers of this generation, excepting, perhaps, his more immediate contemporary, Mr. SWINBURNE, with whom, however, comparison is difficult, seeing that they are the antithesis and contrast, perhaps even the complement one of another. Owing to reasons to some extent independent of poetical ability, the lyrics of Mr. SWINBURNE have hardly received their fair share of praise and popularity, nor will they be so much read as the idyls of Mr. BROWNING, until such time as what may be termed Paganism shall have succeeded in subverting Christianity,—a consummation apparently much desired by some sanguine minds,—but in melody and rhythmic power Mr. BROWNING is even more inferior to Mr. SWINBURNE than he is his superior in sheer humanity. In these two the æsthetic and the rational school of the present day find their respective exponents, but both are wanting in Catholicity, and both fail, therefore, to touch the heart with the ring and the vibration of the greatest art. If Mr. BROWNING is the prophet of modern realism, Mr. SWINBURNE is likewise the oracle of what may be designated modern classicalism; and it is probable that whether their present works live or die in the press and outcome of the next generation of two, their poetry will more or less influence the writers as well as the readers of the future."

ART NEWS.

The gallery of the rejected pictures, or the accepted and yet unhung, of the Royal Academy, has opened close by in New Bond-street; but the best of them have not been sent in. The artists who may hope for better luck or more justice next time have not had the courage to brave the Academy and parade their failures. "The first battalion of an insurrection must be formed of heroes;" this is an insurrection, but the best of the rejected are not among the heroes. One of the pictures is an American subject—"Pipe of Freedom," by T. S. SMITH. A negro made a freedman by President LINCOLN'S Proclamation, is lighting his pipe; a glorious privilege never of course enjoyed under the clanking chains of slavery, where negroes raised tobacco, but were never known to smoke it.

THEATRICAL GOSSIP.

After a most brilliant and successful series of French plays and comedies at the St. James Theatre, we have once more the peerless SCHNEIDER in "La Grande Duchesse" of OFFENBACH, the actress, rôle and composer that most delight the London fashionable world. The Schneider was received by a crammed house like a returning conqueror.

French influence is slowly, perhaps, but not less surely reforming English taste. We enjoy the music of OFFENBACH, we poise ourselves on velocipedes, we are trying to get our museums and galleries of art to open on Sunday, and on Sunday before last, the churchwarden of a rural parish in Kent rode the horse that ran third for the Grand Prix at Paris!

ITALY.

The Formation of the New Cabinet—Its Present Elements—New Prussian Minister—Affairs in Rome—International Courtesies—Free Trade in America—The Tide of Tourists.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Monday, May 17, 1869.

In trying to make a new Cabinet, there has been as much squirming as there would be among a parcel of eels in a basket. As soon as General MENABREA gets his hand on this one or that, thought to be the best for the place, this one or that wriggles out, and in goes the hand for another trial, without much better success. Indeed, it is a surprise to find for the first time, so many men reluctant to serve the State. Italy is well furnished with men of lively intelligence, and as commerce does not offer so large a field for active talents, as with us, so enough can always be found ready to engage in public affairs. You can put your finger upon a hundred living men who have been some time Ministers.

But success came at last, and the King, who had been waiting here for a week, signed the list, and went off to Turin. I have not heard any one deny that the Cabinet, as now composed, has in it good elements; although, indeed, not half the names are changed. Signor FERRARIS, the Minister of the Interior, has been the most influential member of the party of the Permanente, now believed to be broken up. He is a native of Piedmont, and is a lawyer of some distinction. Signor MENGHETTI, who is content to take the office of least consequence on the list, that of Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, has been more than once First Minister of the Crown, and has held other conspicuous positions. No radical element has yet crept into this Board of Cabinet counsellors. Of the nine Ministers, five of the old incumbents still hold their seats. The Diritto, the organ of the third party, seems to be satisfied with the present organization, and says very moderately "the struggles of the crisis ended, there remains for the Chamber, for the Press and the country the very practical mission of judging the Government by its acts; and the field of action is extensive. In the administration of the finances, of the army and of public instruction, the new authority is called to introduce order and stability. It is above all called upon to pay attention to the dissatisfaction which agitates the population, the liberal aspirations which animate, and the want of confidence which weakens it." Another newspaper dwells upon the ill consequences which follow these frequent ministerial crises. In the first place, they cost the country large sums of money, and it can be asserted without fear of denial that one of the principal causes of the deplorable state of the national finances are these frequent changes of the Cabinet. These shifts have for consequence errors and distrust of administration and political skepticism. It goes on to remark that Spain, Greece and Italy are the countries in which these mutations succeed each other with the greatest frequency, and that no one will affirm that these are the most happy countries of Europe. It expresses the hope that the new Ministry, firmly seated, will enjoy a longer term of existence than those which have preceded it.

A few days back arrived here the Count BRASSIER DE SAINT SIMON, the new Pr

CURRENT LITERATURE.

FOAM OF THE SEA!

In Lempriere's classical pages,
Of Cupid's mamma we have read—
Fair Venus, whom poets for ages
Have called Aphrodite instead.
No matter what scandal has wrung from
Her name; even cynics agree,
There's truth in the story she sprung from
The foam of the sea!

Such fanciful fables no longer
Are whispered to sweeten or sell.
Though fiction is certainly stronger
Since Venus stepped out of her shell;
If poets exist they must sing to
The sweethearts, and many there be
Who sigh for the syrens who cling to
The foam of the sea!

When Summer is rapt in her roses,
And love is let loose in the land,
The prettiest flow'ret that grows is
The sweet one that springs from the sand;
Though many be richer and taller,
None bloom of such rareness! ah me!
Why wonder I sing of, and call her
The foam of the sea!

My yellow-haired maiden! the June of
Young lovers who long to repeat
Their lesson of love to the tune of
These wavelets that wash to your feet
Alone! with your fancies remember
The leaf turns to gold on the tree;
June changes too soon to December,
Sweet foam of the sea!

Alone! on those obstinate boulders
When dozens are ready to haste
And battle the breeze for your shoulders,
To fight the old rocks for your waist!
Alone! not a line you are missing,
Oh, would that the type I could be,
Or wave-salt triumphantly kissing
My foam of the sea!

No name that I know could express you,
Removed from the bustle and flow
Of a world which could only address you
In terms but too prosy, I know.
If to them you are Mabel or Carry,
Just promise this only to me;
As long as beside me you tarry
Be foam of the sea!

LADY NELLY THE FLIRT.

From London Society.

"Hallo, Dawson!"

"Ah, Lynwood! How are you, old fellow?"

"Tol-lol—that is to say, as well as can be expected considering the weather. Beastly hot, ain't it?"

"Awful!" was the sympathizing response of Kenelm Dawson, as he withdrew further under the grateful shade of the Oxford and Cambridge Club-house.

"Looking seedy and down in the mouth, old man. What's wrong?" asked the Honorable Tom Lynwood, noticing a certain dejected appearance about his friend.

"Nothing."

"Been in town long? Haven't seen you about."

"No—only just come up."

"And where are you off to now?" continued Lynwood.

"Nowhere. Don't know—I mean, I don't care."

"Well, come along with me, then;" and the Honorable Tom linked his arm in Dawson's and strolled away with him westward.

"Howling swells"—to use the vulgar slang of the day—were the two young men who had just encountered after a tolerably long separation, during the existence of which neither had particularly mourned at the absence of the other, though, now they had met, both were perfectly willing to resume the intimate terms on which they had formerly stood. Kenelm Dawson was a dark, energetic-looking man. Middle-sized, compact, well built, and doing infinite credit to the artists who were intrusted with the decoration of his outward man, he was just the sort of a young fellow to take the eye of women, while his mental capabilities and finished manner secured the first advantage gained by his personal appearance. He had very handsome and decided features, sparkling black eyes, splendid teeth—concealed, except when he smiled, by a well-trimmed mustache—the rest of the face clean-shaven, and the whole surmounted by a head of hair that was the pride and glory of the gentleman who was honored with the welcome task of keeping it in order. And Kenelm Dawson was accomplished too—had an eye for form and color—was a tolerable painter, but a first-rate hand at catching a likeness, with a considerable taste for caricature—which latter quality he kept within very strict bounds, and so hindered it from becoming offensive. Then he was gifted with a knack of picking up languages, and had indeed in more than half a dozen trips to Paris, Biarritz, Naples, Hombourg, and such-like haunts of iniquity, acted with great renown as interpreter for his more insular friend Tom Lynwood. But his grand point was his music: an accurate ear—a skilled touch on the piano, delicate and soft and lingering, as the falling of a snow-flake on a crocus; or clear, sharp, and metallic, like the crack of a rifle, as occasion might demand—a delicious tenor voice, trained and cultivated with great care—and that wonderful talent of "expression," which has not been inaptly described as the power of "singing the soul out of an angel." Kenelm Dawson had five hundred a year, with a couple of thousand pounds' worth of debts, no profession, was sound and free from vice, had an excellent digestion, and was in all respects an eligible parti for a lady with lots of money, some little brains, and a mind a trifle above buttonly bonnets and the correct method of trailing a long skirt in a ball-room without having it torn out of the gathers.

The Honorable Tom Lynwood was of a very different stamp. A fine "plan and elevation" of a man, as you looked at him from behind, but with a soft, meaningless face, on a front view, that took away all dignity from the tout ensemble of his appearance. In fact, he was what women call, with a sneer, a "pretty man." A soft, delicate skin, tinted with a complexion that the votaries of Mme. Rachel might envy—features regular as those of a two-guinea doll—blue eyes of a weak and irresolute character—a long silky blonde mustache—golden whiskers falling away in points toward the backs of his shoulders—and small pink coral ears, apparently more for ornament than use. He was rather destitute of brains, was the Honorable Tom Lynwood; and, indeed, to do him justice, was quite conscious of his defect in this regard, and would not hesitate, in his more confidential moments, to express to you his regrets at not being "a dashed clever fellow, like Dawson there." To be sure he was well off for this world's gear, having many more thousands than Dawson had hundreds, and endeavored, with praiseworthy effort, and the aid of all the minor vices, to rid himself of this burden of gold and get through his yearly income in a satisfactory manner. He was favorably noted in the stud-books of many Belgravian mothers as a promising colt, but there was a certain timidity—not to say skittishness—about this young prancer that had hitherto made him shy wildly at the bit and bridle matrimonial, and, to continue the language of the stable, he had never yet been backed.

"Can't make out what the deuce is the matter with you, Dawson," remarked Tom Lynwood, as they lounged into the Falernian Club; "you are as dull—as dull as if you had been in town all the season—since February, egad."

"There is nothing the matter with me," answered Kenelm Dawson rather testily—he hated being bored about his personal manner—"nothing whatever; only I have been traveling about the country hunting some one up, and am tired and disgusted."

"Have a sherry and seltzer? Nothing sets a fellow up like that if one is nipped."

"Oh, anything to please you," said Dawson, dropping wearisomely into a soft-cushioned lounging-chair.

"Ah, I see what it is," said Lynwood, thoughtfully picking his teeth; "you have been dodging after some girl—it bores one awfully, that sort of thing. Why, even I—though you would hardly believe it—have been rather in that way myself of late." And the huge creature actually blushed, as is the habit of your young Englishman when making a confession of such weak-mindedness to his most intimate friend.

"What—spoons?" asked Dawson, vastly amused at the idea of Lynwood's being in love.

"Regular spoons this time. 'Jove, I didn't think I was quite such a fool," answered Lynwood, trying hard to laugh off his disexposure.

"A fellow never knows what a fool he can be until he tries," sententiously remarked Dawson, as he refreshed himself with the amber fluid a thoughtful waiter had supplied.

"Oh, there is nothing stupid in my case—a devilish handsome girl, and all that sort of thing—a clever one, too—deuced accomplished—sings, and all the rest of it. And, pon my soul, I think she suits me down to the ground." Lynwood spoke as rapidly as his constitutional laziness would allow, in hopes of making himself appear comfortable and familiar with his subject.

"Tin?"

"Not a rap, I believe. But that doesn't matter much in my case. Uncommon good family, though."

"Have you proposed?" asked Dawson, emitting the smoke of his cigar in delicate spiral wreaths from his nostrils.

"No, confound it—there is a dragon of an aunt in the way. Old lady evidently trying to hook me for her own daughter—that game won't pay, though."

"What's the girl's name?"

"Milroy—Bella Milroy—deuced nice little thing, too, but—"

"Are they in town?" interrupted Dawson, beginning to feel interested as he saw the usually listless Lynwood so eager about the affair.

"No, down at Cowes. I picked up with them at the end of April, when I brought out the yacht."

"Hum! And when did you leave your lady-love?"

"Lady-love be hanged! Don't, Dawson. Confound it! a man does not like chaff about this sort of thing."

"I didn't wish her to be hanged, my hot-blooded youth. But when did you leave her?"

"A couple of days ago."

"This is the middle of June. May—thirty-one days—and ten makes forty-one—and five—forty-six. Forty-six days' spooning. You must be tolerably gone, Master Tom!"

The Honorable Tom Lynwood looked as bashful as a maiden of "sweet seventeen" used to do before the precocity of a fast generation made a woman passé at two-and-twenty.

"Well, why don't you go down to your yacht again, and finish the matter off-hand?" continued Dawson.

"Why, to tell you the truth, I came up to for—in fact— By Jove! what a fool I am! Why, you are the very fellow." And Lynwood clapped his hand on his knee, and looked his friend straight in the face.

"If you will speak a little coherently, perhaps I may understand you. What do you mean?"

"Why, don't you see? I ran up to look for a decent sort of chap to spend a few weeks or so with me in the yacht, and then, you know, he could—he might—perhaps you'd take—"

"Take the other girl off your hands! What an old schemer you are, Tom!" and Dawson went off in a fit of laughter. Tom Lynwood laughed too, but in a short, uneasy way, and took advantage of the first pause to continue:

"But I say, Dawson, old man, you may as well; it will do you a lot of good, as you are seedy; a snug cabin to yourself; my cook on board is first chop; we have a splendid tap of wines; and, by Jove, the—the other girl is a stunner if you feel inclined to flirt a bit."

"'Gad, I think I'll go. Town is beastly full, and I don't feel inclined to go out much. I might do worse."

"Of course you might," answered Lynwood, in high delight at his almost unexpected success; "it will be awfully jolly, and we shall have no end of fun. Let us be off by this evening's mail."

"Not a bit of it—to morrow, or perhaps next day. I have a lot of things to do. But mind, Tom, no humbug, I'm not going to get myself mixed up with some poor girl, just to please you," added Dawson, who had no mean appreciation of his own talents as a lady-killer.

"Oh, of course not; only a little harmless flirting. Well, to-morrow, then?"

"To-morrow or next day. Now I must be off to Kensington to see my old governor. Ta, ta." And Kenelm Dawson strutted up St. James Street as though half London belonged to him.

"When shall you have finished those tiresome letters, Aunt Clare?" asked Lady Nelly Chatterton, looking up impatiently from a novel she was pretending to read.

"Not for some time, dear. Why?" said Mrs. Milroy, ceasing, at the interruption, to write.

"Because it is time for us to go and bathe, is it not, Bella?" she asked of her demure cousin, who sat by the open window looking out on the Parade, and the crowd of yachts swinging to their anchors in Cowes Roads.

"Yes. We ought to go soon, or we shall have to wait an age for a machine," answered Bella Milroy, putting down the glasses through which she had been examining the gay scene.

"Well, Nelly, perhaps for this once you had better go without me. Take Larkin with you, and don't stay too long in the water; it hardens the complexion so."

"Oh, thank you, Aunt Clare," and pretty Lady Nelly bounced up from her chair like a child released from school. "We shall be as good as gold. Come along, Bella, we'll have such a jolly swim."

"Nelly!" remonstrated Mrs. Milroy, in a reproachful tone.

"Well, Aunt Clare, what have I done now?"

"Jolly! Is that a word for a young lady to use?"

"Well! I won't say it again, Aunt Clare; there," and she kissed Mrs. Milroy in token of repentance, put her arm round her cousin's waist, and half-dragged, half-danced her out of the pleasant drawing-room.

Lady Nelly was a flirt. So her female friends said, when they felt more than usually angered at her success among men, and so she confessed herself when taxed with the heinous crime, laughingly (she was always laughing) declaring that nature had made her one, and therefore she could not help it. But her flirting was of a tolerably harmless character, inasmuch as it rose from high spirits, an aptitude for being pleased and pleasing, and was not a coldblooded system of hunting down men with a view of turning them to profit as possible husbands, or of decorating her belt with the scalps of many victims, from wanton vanity. So the pleasant sin sat on her lightly and gracefully, and but doubled its own effect from its evident want of method and scheme. Besides, Lady Nelly had a secret in her heart of hearts, a secret that she breathed to no one, but that gave her an instinctive power of warning men off the premises when they sought a too close intimacy. Her cousin, Bella, could never make her out, and that sly little damsel—with her delicate, dark features, and large, soft, long-lashed, black eyes—frequently wondered to herself why Nelly would never allow any of the very good offers, which she might have had if she chose, to be made. Not that Bella Milroy ever felt the pangs of love herself, or understood the nature of the tender passion in any one degree, but she had very wide-awake ideas as regarded marriage, and was by no means a girl to let any chance of that consummation slip through her fingers for want of a little judicious encouragement. Miss Milroy was like the famous J. B. in Dombey and Son, "Sly, sir, devilish sly!" and was just such a girl as might be safely backed to make a capital match, and turn out a respectable and respected wife.

An hour and three-quarters occupied in the pleasures (unknown to the coarse mind of man) of undressing and dressing—five minutes shivering on the steps of the bathing-box, trembling, and uttering small feminine shrieks of feigned timidity—ten minutes splashing and laughing and rolling in the dancing blue waves—made up the two hours allotted to the bath; and the two girls came tripping down the rickety plank that led to the shore, and made their way, by the path that leads under the club-house, toward the Parade, where Mrs. Milroy had her apartments. Of course their back-hair was down (in this false age of chignons and pearl-powder every girl possessed of natural tresses, and a tolerable complexion, eagerly snatches at any lawful opportunity of displaying the reality of her charms) and floated wildly in the fresh breeze, as they walked briskly along.

"Goodness, Bella! look there," Lady Nelly said, with a sudden start, as they rounded the club, and caught sight of the saluting guns at the landing-place.

"Look where? what is the matter, you silly thing?"

"Sitting on the cannons—isn't it Mr.—Mr. ——"

"Mr. Lynwood. Of course it is. He was here this morning. I saw him on board his yacht from the window just before we left home." And Miss Milroy took a thirsty look at her cousin's face. She did not half like Lady Nelly's evident emotion at seeing the Honorable Mr. Lynwood.

"You saw him this morning? Why did you not tell us?"

"If I had known you were so concerned about him, Nelly, I would."

"I am not at all 'concerned about him,' as you call it," was the indignant retort. "Do let us go back, Bella, dear?" she added with a slight blush of confusion. But it was too late, for just at that moment the Honorable Tom happened to yawn violently. In the exertion his boating-hat fell off, and turning round to pick it up, he observed the two girls.

"Hallo! I say, Dawson, here they come, by Jove. Let us go and meet them."

"Oh, bother, better finish our weeds. We can call in the afternoon." Dawson disgusted his friend by his apathy; in fact, he did not even turn his head to view the beauties, but remained sprawling over a gun.

"Nonsense! Come along." Lynwood threw his cigar hissing into the sea, and half pulled his friend round.

"Lord bless me! why it is ——," uttered Dawson, in a tone of intense surprise.

"Do you know her? Where did you meet?" interrupted Lynwood, jealously.

"Let me see; where was it? Bangor?"

"Bangor, yes. That's where old mother Milroy usually hangs out. Throw that beastly cigar away and be civil," and the two went up to meet the girls. There was a deep blush on Lady Nelly's fair cheek, and a bright sparkle in her blue eyes as she met the gentlemen, and gave Lynwood her hand.

Dawson took off his hat and divided a bow between the two ladies.

"I think I have had the pleasure of meeting Miss Milroy and Lady Nelly Chatterton before," he said to the former, with a glance at the latter. Miss Milroy bowed and smiled graciously. She remembered the face, but could not quite call to mind where she had met Mr.

"Mr. Dawson, Bella," said Lady Nelly, supplying the name, "at a picnic to Lewarch Castle, don't you remember?"

Mr. Dawson expressed his gratitude for Lady Nelly's recollection of him, and then proceeded to recall the circumstances to Bella Milroy's mind. The picnic was about three years ago, a very large one, he said, one of those monstrous affairs where half the people don't know the other half, and all are broken up into cliques and parties of their own. Yes, and he had had the pleasure of dancing with Miss Milroy one dance. He did not forget it.

Miss Milroy began to think she did remember him now; but it must have been a "slow" dance. She never forgot any one she waltzed with; she supposed he must have waltzed with her cousin, from the fact of Lady Nelly remembering him at once? Yes, he had done so—twice, he believed; but did girls always remember the men they waltzed with? Miss Milroy thought so, she did, always. Then Kenelm Dawson began to inquire into the waltzing capabilities of Cowes, and hoped there would be some balls. He had imagined it would be awfully slow, and only Tom Lynwood had regularly bullied him into it, (the fib didn't choke him!) he should never have had the pleasure of meeting Miss Milroy here.

"But what brought you down?" he continued, as they walked along after Lady Nelly and Lynwood. "I thought Mrs. Milroy lived at Bangor?"

"So we do. Indeed, it was more for my cousin's sake than anything else we came here."

"But why for Lady Nelly's sake? Her family are not residents at Bangor, are they?"

"No; poor old Lord De Proser is such a dreadful invalid that he has to live altogether at Cheltenham. But Nelly was consigned to us for the summer, and I suppose mamma thought Bangor would be dull for her. In fact, Mr. Dawson, I don't exactly know why we came, but I am very glad we did."

"Fond of yachting, Miss Milroy?"

"Oh! I adore it of all things," answered the enthusiastic young deceiver. She was, in fact, a very indifferent sailor, and usually prudently retired below on the slightest provocation from wind or wave.

"Then I hope we shall have the pleasure of many a cruise together in the Lalage. I am regularly entered as one of her crew, you know."

"How charming!" gushed Miss Milroy. She was wondering what on earth this man was, and if he had an income corresponding to his appearance and connection with the Honorable Mr. Lynwood. The latter gentleman was making, he flattered himself, great running with a charming Lady Nelly; and indeed, to judge from the scraps of conversation and laughter that were borne back on the inspiriting breeze, the two were thoroughly well pleased with one another. Tom Lynwood thought he had never before known her so pleasant or looking so pretty. She laughed silvery laughs of ringing fun (displaying snowy treasures of teeth) as she caught up his far from novel remarks and turned them into sources of merriment. She flushed with eagerness as she looked back over her shoulder, and declared she was so glad dear Bella seemed to enjoy Mr. —Mr. Dashwood—was that his name? Oh, no, Dawson—she forgot for the moment —Mr. Dawson's company. She tripped along with the light, dancing step of an opera fairy, and declared, with a roguish glance of the blue eyes, when they arrived opposite their house, that it was too soon to go into lunch yet, and that Aunt Milroy would not have finished her letters. She praised the Lalage as the swan-like yacht gracefully rose and fell, and seemed to courtesy to the bright waves that sought to disturb her at her moorings. And when they came to the very end of the Parade and had to turn, Lady Nelly turned round like a tectotum, so that her flowing brown locks formed a halo round her face, and their rich auburn tint flashed in Tom Lynwood's eyes as they floated between the sun and him. Altogether he never spent such a delightful half hour in his life, and was in a perfect thrill of happiness by the time Bella Milroy found it necessary to declare the time for luncheon had arrived.

"I am afraid almost to ask you in, Mr. Lynwood," she said; "I don't know whether we have anything to offer you."

"Except bread and butter and jam," put in Lady Nelly; "you can eat bread and jam, Mr. Lynwood?"

"Haw, yes; 'sure I can. Anything would be delightful in—with ——"

"Go on, Mr. Lynwood." Lady Nelly laughed a little maliciously; but Mr. Lynwood blushed and was silent as he contemplated the failure of his compliment.

"We shall be delighted to take our chance, Miss Milroy, if you meant to include me."

"Oh, of course, Mr. Dawson." And the whole party went upstairs.

Mrs. Milroy received the gentlemen very graciously, and, while the girls were upstairs arranging their hair, managed with well-bred ease to find out all necessary particulars regarding Kenelm Dawson's family and so forth. Tom Lynwood lounged on a chair by one of the open windows, musing on the beauties of Lady Nelly's person and mind—which latter seemed the more wonderful as he could not understand them—but yet unable to prevent his vagrant eyes from following every pretty face, or natty figure, that passed on the Parade below.

With the usual art of a fond mamma, Mrs. Milroy managed to place her daughter beside Tom Lynwood at lunch, leaving Lady Nelly to the care of Kenelm Dawson. The bread-and-butter and jam that had been threatened turned out to be an elegant though light lunch, and under its influence the whole party got on in first-rate style. Bella Milroy came out very strong—unusually strong for her—even succeeding after a while in partially consoling for a time her large neighbor for his affliction in being on the opposite side of the table to Lady Nelly. She flattered and pleased him by talking about and praising the beautiful Lalage declaring her great desire for a constant succession of cruises in that wondrous craft. She even delicately congratulated him on his success with her cousin, but in such a graceful and half-concealed way that he experienced the pleasure without knowing the cause. Kenelm Dawson and Lady Nelly were in high spirits. They seemed to grow intimate all at once, and to know many mutual acquaintances whose appearances and characters they pulled to pieces with great energy and amusement. If Lady Nelly was charming on the Parade with Tom Lynwood, she was twice as charming in the parlor with Dawson, while he was beyond doubt greatly pleased with her brilliant style, her frank, almost childish, fund of merriment, and her sparkling high spirits. Bella Milroy put this down as the result of the waltzing reminiscences of Lewarch Castle; but Tom Lynwood, with a dreary foreboding of evil, almost cursed himself toward the close of the repast with his folly in introducing such a "dashed clever fellow" to the society of his mistress.

With the eagle eye of a general sweeping the field of battle, Mrs. Milroy saw that it would not do to allow Lynwood to fall into a state of despair all at once, lest perchance he should take himself off in disgust from Cowes; so she cleverly sounded bugles of retreat and let the men understand that it was time to make their bow.

"Dash it all, Dawson! I did not ask you to come down for that," remonstrated Lynwood, as the two gained the deck of the Lalage. (From Mrs. Milroy's house to the landing slip was only a few yards, and Tom had had to bottle up his wrath while being rowed to the yacht.)

"For what?" Dawson's face could be perfectly expressionless when its master chose.

"For what? For humbugging about Lady Nelly the way you were all lunch-time!" Dawson opened his eyes wide.

"My dear fellow, did you not tell me I was to flirt with her so that you might spoon with Bella Milroy?"

"Bella Milroy be hanged! I never mentioned her name."

"I'll swear you did, at the Falernian that day. You said she was a 'devilish handsome girl,' deuced nice little thing.' Why, you never mentioned Lady Nelly at all, and I had no idea who the 'other girl' was."

"Of course I meant Lady Nelly; any one but a muff would have known that."

"Thank you for nothing. However, there is no harm done, only pray be more explicit next time. Let us slip our moorings and run down to Ryde and see what's going on there."

A month had glided by, and the Honorable Tom Lynwood found himself in a most unhappy frame of mind. He was as much in love with Lady Nelly as he could be with any one, but the whole affair seemed beset with difficulties. Kenelm Dawson had found out that the merry little lady had been already bartered away by her fond parents to a rickety marquis, at present trying to regain his shattered health at the German baths, and that Mrs. Milroy had been a party to the bargain. When Lynwood heard this he was half frantic with rage, and howled Lalage until his skipper and crew had almost just foundations for their supposition that their master was either drunk or mad.

"But what shall I do, Dawson? What can I do to save her from such an infamous marriage?"

"Don't know, I'm sure; better go away, I should say."

"Go to the ——; why should I go away? I'm sure she would sooner have me than that knock-kneed little roué."

Dawson suggested that he should propose if he thought so, but he greatly feared that Mrs. Milroy would spirit Lady Nelly home to her parents if she heard of it. Indeed, that lady would have gone home long ago—she was beginning to smell a rat—had not Lynwood, by Dawson's advice, paid considerable attention to Miss Bella so as to induce her mother to hope that he had serious thoughts of proposing to that young lady. Bella had accepted Tom's awkward and constrained attentions con amore, and, indeed, had so agreeably reciprocated them, that the worthy gentleman would certainly have fallen head over heels in love with her were it not for the first passion that engrossed his heart. What made it worse for poor Lynwood was, that in all this trouble and turmoil of mind he was going through, Lady Nelly—though joining in all the picnics and yachting excursions with great glee—never seemed in the least put out, or to understand that he was suffering, but, on the contrary, was as merry as a bird, and fluttered and chirruped about with unflagging spirits. Bella Milroy, the sly and the demure, watched all, noted all, bided the event with a praiseworthy patience that did her infinite credit, and accepted the attentions freely lavished on her by both gentlemen with calmness and grand equanimity of soul.

At last Tom Lynwood could stand the suspense no longer; he was getting pale and thin under the unwonted mental excitement, and resolved to bring matters to a crisis. A picnic had been arranged across the water to the New Forest, and at that, Tom made up his mind, he would meet his fate. The girls dressed alike in the most recherché of yachting costumes. Bella looked pretty and piquante, but Lady Nelly was divine. Her dress was intensely nautical, and none but an unusually good-looking girl could wear it with effect. A blue-striped shirt with large rolling collar and black silk necktie in a sailor's knot. A blue cloth jacket with gilt naval buttons; a close-fitting short skirt of blue serge trimmed with cord, and canvas bottines of the neatest possible make. A broad leather belt and gold clasp confined the waist, and in it was stuck a man-o'-war's-man's knife of the regulation pattern, slung round the fair neck by a plaited cord lanyard, such as the blue-jackets always wear. A saucy little glazed hat was perched daintily on the auburn-tinted locks, and completed the fascinating costume.

Tom Lynwood could hardly contain himself during the passage across the Solent, the more especially as he was 'on duty' with Bella Milroy, and was obliged to allow Dawson the pleasure of Lady Nelly's intimate companionship during the whole voyage. At last the Lalage completed her voyage. Her anchor was let go, and the party got into the boat to seek out a pleasant forest nook for the picnic.

Dawson had agreed to mislead Mrs. Milroy and Bella—the latter was perfectly well aware of what was going on—and Tom Lynwood easily found an opportunity of saying with much blundering, stammering, and blushing, the oft-rehearsed speech declaring his love.

"Marry you, Mr. Lynwood?" Lady Nelly actually had the cruelty to burst out laughing in his face. "Why, I thought you knew I was engaged."

The Honorable Thomas Lynwood was fairly nonplussed. He could have understood anything but this. He had expected blushes, confusion, perhaps indignation and passion-tears. Fellows had told him one of these latter was the usual temper in which ladies received such declarations; but to be laughed at! he had never heard of such a thing. But Lady Nelly was too kindhearted (!) to torture him by her fun, so she told him; and presently became grave, and said he must be aware that her friends had made other arrangements for her.

"But, Lady Nelly, you—you don't care for the other man, do you?"

She could hardly help laughing again, but she controlled herself, hung down her head, and commenced plucking at the tassel of her parasol as she told him, in delicate language, that she did not care for either of them. Honest Tom Lynwood thought he saw signs of relenting, and urged her with the hackneyed plea that she might in time come to love him. Then she said gravely and earnestly she was quite sure she never could, and warned him not to deceive himself. But he urged her more and more, until at last—rather to his astonishment—she consented to marry him provided it could be done secretly. In a rapture he tried to kiss her; but this she positively would not allow, and insisted on joining her aunt. And so ended the strange courtship.

"I congratulate you, my dear fellow; you are deuced lucky, and ought to be the happiest man in England," said Dawson that night, as they sat on the deck of the "Lalage," in the calm starlight, and watched the twinkling lamps in the houses of Cowes. "Deuced queer girl, though, to take it the way she did; and 'pon my honor I don't see why it should be secret."

"Her family would kick up the devil and all of a shindy if they had to throw little FitzAlban over, while now, if they know nothing of it, he cannot blame the old people."

So the two went into a committee of ways and means, and it was settled that the banns might be put up. Lady Nelly would not consent to be married except in this old-fashioned style—at Southampton, and no one be a bit the wiser. Lynwood could do the necessary residence without exciting suspicion, by taking the Lalage over on pretence of having her copper cleaned; and, finally, Dawson thought that Bella Milroy might be safely taken into confidence on the matter.

"But why? why, Dawson? she is safe to tell her mother, and then there will be the deuce to pay and no pitch hot."

"Not she; I don't mind telling you, Tom, that she and I understand one another. I'll make it all safe; don't be afraid."

And after a refreshing brandy and soda, the two went below to their berths.

A lovely August morning, and the bright blue waters of the Solent glittering again as they foamed and danced and broke into tiny wavelets under the influence of a brisk breeze that came up sharp and fresh from the Needles. The "Lalage" lay at her moorings opposite the Royal Squadron Club-house. She had come over the night previous from Southampton, bearing three notes from her owner, who had stayed behind. One was for Mrs. Milroy, requesting her to make use of the yacht whenever she pleased, under the care of his friend, Mr. Dawson, and stating that the writer was unfortunately detained in Southampton by urgent business for a day or two. One was for Dawson, himself, who was staying at the Gloucester Hotel on the Parade, and contained the third, which was of course for the bride elect—Lady Nelly—and was to be delivered as soon as possible. Dawson's ran as follows:

MY DEAR KENELM: Be sure you are in time to-morrow. The girls can easily send a line by a waterman, that will keep the old woman quiet—"out for a walk, and tempted by the fine day to go with Mr. Dawson for a cruise"—anything of that sort will do. If the wind fails or goes wrong, come by steamer. I have the parsons and all that ready this side. Now, mind, don't make a bungle of it. After the job, Nelly and I can start per train for Devonshire. Don't you think it would be as well if you and Miss Milroy were to get spliced at the same time? There will be deuce's own row when Mrs. M. nears of it, and Cowes will be too hot for you. They tell me you could get turned off by special license—only a guinea, and I don't mind standing it for all your kindness—or by the registrar, which costs a sailing. Whatever you do, don't muddle things.

Yours, sincerely, T. LYNWOOD.

TO KENELM DAWSON, Esq., Gloucester Hotel.

"Are you not well, Bella, dear?" asked Mrs. Milroy that morning, as she noticed her daughter's pale face at the breakfast-table (Lady Nelly was flushed.)

"I have a headache, mamma; I didn't sleep well."

"You should keep quiet to-day, dear, and not go out."

Lady Nelly looked dismayed for a moment and her color went; but she found fresh courage, and said, "Oh, Aunt Clare! I am sure the very best thing for her would be a good brisk walk after breakfast."

"Yes, mamma; Nelly and I will go for a stroll. The fresh air will do me good."

"Well, dear, be careful; I can't go with you, I have some accounts to do."

A great load was taken off the minds of both girls at this declaration, and soon afterward they went up to get ready for their walk.

Kenelm Dawson was waiting for them impatiently. He led them round the front of the club and placed them in the Lalage's boat. Soon they reached the yacht, got hurriedly on deck, and went below for fear Mrs. Milroy should be looking through her glasses from the window and see them.

"Slip the moorings and stand over toward Southampton, Withers," said Dawson to the skipper.

"Ay, ay, sir!" and the Lalage had soon spread her snow-white wings, and was careering along as she lay over to the fresh sou'-westerly breeze.

About noon Mrs. Milroy began to get a little anxious about the girls, and sent Larkin, the maid, to look along the Prince's Green and bring them home. In about an hour the maid returned; she had not seen them. Then Mrs. Milroy sent over to the Gloucester to know if Mr. Dawson was in his rooms. No; he had left immediately after breakfast, and the head waiter rather thought he had gone out yachting with some ladies. Foolish girls! said Mrs. Milroy, no doubt he had persuaded them to go with him. However, it could not be helped now, and she would read them a good lecture on their return. So the worthy lady sat down to her lunch at half-past two—the usual hour—and consolated herself afterward, as was her habit, with a pious book and a doze. She woke up with a start, as a thundering knock came to the door. Lynwood ran up stairs, his eyes flaming with excitement, and his whole air disordered.

"Where—where is Lady Nelly, Mrs. Milroy?"

"Nelly—Bella—why they went out after breakfast, and I have not seen them since." She was frightened by his wild manner.

"With whom?"

"By themselves. But, for God's sake, Mr. Lynwood, what has happened?" and the poor worldly woman began to sob from terror.

"I know no more than the dead. I expected them with Dawson at Southampton by ten or eleven."

"Dawson—you expected them? What does it all mean?"

Another knock at the door; but this time timid and feeble. The mother and Lynwood rushed down stairs. They met Bella entering, pale as death, and tottering as though she would fall.

"Bella, my darling, darling girl! what has happened?"

But Bella, when she saw Lynwood's convulsed face, staggered and dropped in her mother's arms in a faint. They dragged her into the parlor, and set to work reviving her. After a long while she came to, but a good hour had elapsed before she was sufficiently recovered to tell a coherent tale. In fact she was unwilling to tell it, as it was one that had, in part, to be composed as she went along. Her story, brought out in gaps and piecemeal, and driving Lynwood nearly crazy by the delays in its utterance, was to this effect. Mr. Dawson had persuaded them—she did not think Nelly was so deceitful—to go with him for a cruise. They had started, going toward Southampton. When half way across, the yacht had been put about, and they bore up for Ryde. Nelly had changed her manner altogether, and behaved very strangely with Mr. Dawson. At Ryde Pier they agreed to land and have lunch at a hotel, after amusing themselves on the pier. To her astonishment, a carriage and four was waiting at the end of the pier—they said they were going to get married (a great groan from Lynwood interrupted her.) They asked her to go with them. She refused. They drove off up the town, and she came back by the next boat. And at this stage—to avoid possible unpleasantness—Miss Bella resolved to and did go off in a second faint.

The fierceness of Tom Lynwood's rage may not be described in words. He nearly choked with passion. He stamped up and down the parlor, heedless of Mrs. Milroy's wailings over her poor Bella's state. (The sly puss was only malingering this time, but dread of Lynwood's questioning her too closely prevented her recovery.) Tom forgot himself entirely, and commenced to curse and swear at the vile duplicity of Dawson, Lady Nelly and all; and finally, driven nearly crazy by some crumbs of consolation that Mrs. Milroy offered him, in the intervals of her attendance on her daughter, to the effect that it might all be for the best, and that he was well rid of such an atrociously deceitful minx, he banged violently out of the house; and Bella Milroy instantly recovered.

He heard a steamboat whistling as he gained the Parade; mechanically looked at his watch; found it was past four; and dimly remembered that the Southampton boat started about then. He jumped into a waterman's punt, caught the steamer as she emerged from the river, and reached the mainland in due course. In a sort of walking-dream, he packed up his things, paid his hotel bill, left a note for his skipper, ordering him to have the yacht dismantled, and took the evening mail for town. The next night he found himself in Paris, wandering about like an uneasy spirit, seeking rest and finding none.

In about a month's time he found he had almost recovered from the shock of his disappointment, and was able, with tolerable composure, to open a letter from Kenelm Dawson, that had been forwarded from his London address. It ran as follows:

DEAR OLD TOM: Pray forgive us—Nelly and myself—for any pain we may have caused you. It was cruel, perhaps, but we could not help it. We had been in love with one another for a long time—ever since the picnic at Lewarch Castle, which you may have heard us speak of. With my small means, of course her family would never consent to our marriage; and I was only tolerated about the Cheltenham house until some wealthier man came to the front. The Marquis of Fitz Alban did so, and I received my congé. I hung about the premises still, until old Lord De Proser—may his gout never be less—couldn't stand it any longer, and secretly dispatched Nelly off to Bangor. Mrs. Milroy was asked to take her away somewhere for the summer to destroy the trail, but was not told anything of me, for fear of her gossiping tongue. Fancy the astonishment and delight of Nelly and myself, when, through your unintentionally kind offices, we were brought together at Cowes. Now, old boy, I'll ask you, would you not have done what I did under the circumstances? I am sure you would; and am equally sure you will forgive us when you come to look the matter coolly in the face. Our banns were put up at Northwood, two miles and a half from Cowes, and the parish church, where we were well aware that none of the fashionable people ever went, at the same time yours were at Southampton, and so we were safe. We drove over there from Ryde; got spliced, doubled back to Ryde, and thence to Devonshire, where we well knew you would not go after your disappointment. We calculated on persuading Bella Milroy to accompany us to Northwood, but she would not. A private soldier from Parkhurst, who was passing at the time, consented to give Nelly away in consideration of a pint of beer, and his comrade acted as my "best man." So all was according to regulation. Now don't be in the blues, old man, about this little disappointment; there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it—and Bella Milroy is a charming girl.

Yours, ever sincerely,
KENELM DAWSON.

HONORABLE TOM LYNWOOD.

Tom Lynwood did not know that Miss Milroy had been acquainted with the secret of Dawson and Lady Nelly from a very early date after the first meeting at Cowes, until he had been married some little time, when Bella graciously informed her delighted husband that she had all along marked him down for herself, and took what she considered the best means to secure her prey.

FINDING THE MAMMOTH.—In the year 1799, a chief of a native tribe was searching for ivory along the banks of the Lena, when, to his great horror and fright, he saw in a cliff of the gravel just mentioned a huge block of ice, and in it what he considered a beast of evil omen. He became ill from terror, but, on his recovery, remembering that the beast had tusks which were like those he was searching for, he again visited the spot. There stood, all encased in transparent ice, a creature like an elephant in shape, 9 feet high and 16 feet long, and with enormous tusks projecting for 8 feet or 10 feet and curving at their tips. The huge brute was hairy; it had long black bristles all over it, and they were from a foot to 16 inches long; it had also long hair covering the whole body and short fur. The chief waited and watched for five years. By the end of that time the ice had melted, and the mammoth presented itself in its flesh and hairy hide to the astonished natives. The tusks were cut off and sold, the neighboring inhabitants came with their dogs and feasted on the carcase, and the wolves picked the bones. Fortunately a naturalist heard of it, and collected the bones and specimens of the hair, 20 pounds' weight of which were gathered from the wet sand bank on which the mammoth rested, and the tusks he repurchased. He carried the whole to the nearest capital, St. Petersburg, a distance of 7,280 miles, where it became one of the wonders of the world, and where it may still be seen in the museum of which it forms a most remarkable feature.—From "World of Wonders."

FROM A HUSBAND.

Fonder, tenderer, ever fonder,
But increase my love can know,
Here on earth, hereafter yonder,
Love with me must ever grow;
Loving you, it must be so.

Dearer, dearer, ever dearer;
Loved in youth for that fair face,
Now my heart has seen you nearer,
That first love to this gives place,
For your soul's diviner grace.

Ah! How sweet was that young passion,
Caught from fairness, O how fair!
That fed full even from the fashion
Of the dress you deigned to wear,
When your beauty sunned the air.

O the life-quake then that shook me
When on me seemed turned that gaze,
When hair, brow, speech or laughter took me
Captive with a dumb amaze,
Dazzled with your beauty's blaze.

Time that charm has not marred blindly,
If his touch a harm has wrought,
Still some rar

manlike manner, gave a check for the amount. Mr. TROLLOPE calls it wonderful, the love an innkeeper has for his bill in its entirety: an account is brought to you, with a respectable total of five or six pounds, and you complain of but one article: that fire in the bedroom was never lighted, or that second glass of brandy and water never called for. "You desire to have the shilling expunged, and all the host's pleasure in the whole transaction is destroyed. Oh, my friends, pay for the brandy and water, though you never drank it; suffer the fire to pass, though it never warmed you. Why make a good man miserable for such a trifle?—Once a Week.

AFTER DEATH.

She was to thee as some sweet vine that girds
A vast, proud oak, and feels his mighty heart
Throb under listening tendrils, while apart
His spirit dwells, with sunbeams and glad birds.

Content in only loving, she had sought
Never for love's return. Thy loftiness
Could stoop not, and her lowlihood still less
Might emulate the reaches of thy thought.

But now her clasping love has loosed its hold,
And dropped from thy life's stateliness and strength.
A little thou rememberest at length,
And mournest—thou so passionless of old!

Just as the oak, loud winds being calm, no more
Hears under his dim labyrinth of leaves
The delicate vine-stems fluttering, and grieves
For that which he had heeded not before.

THE THIEVES' CLAN OF PARIS.

M. MAXIME DU CAMP has been making a very thorough inquiry into what he calls the Thieves' Clan (Clan du Vol) at Paris. The facts which he brings to light have political and moral importance; but they possess in addition no ordinary degree of social and romantic interest. M. MAXIME DU CAMP has been a great traveler. He has visited the most out-of-the-way regions of Asia and Africa, and has put his experiences on record in works which are valuable additions to our knowledge of the stationary or retrogressive population of the East. But among the rudest inhabitants of Nubia, among the nomads of Arabia, in the tents of the Bedouins, and in the villages of Asia Minor, he has failed to find physical or moral degradation which can be compared with that which has its retreats and shelter in Paris. The last extremes of civilization and barbarism meet side by side, and jostle each other in the streets. The danger and the scandal are on the increase in Paris as well as in London. The number of the thieves' clan in the former city does not admit of being exactly estimated; but allowing for the greater vigilance of the Police, its growth may be judged by the increase, year by year, in the number of arrests. These had risen from 20,726 in 1857 to 31,437 in 1867; or in other words the numbers had been augmented by a third in ten years. In 1868 they were 35,751. M. MAXIME DU CAMP attributes this alarming development of habitual crime in Paris to the fact that the French are not a colonizing population; that the excess of the country population, which the census returns do not however place at a high figure, flows into Paris, and that the spirit of enterprise not finding honest channels is diverted into crime. But the same phenomenon shows itself in London; and here at least the same explanation only partially applies. A sounder hypothesis is, that the habitual criminals of both cities form not only a class, but a caste, or, as M. DU CAMP has it, a clan. The order is hereditary. It multiplies like any other, and receives additions from without from persons to whom strong passions and weak will, physical energy and moral weakness, make a life of regular industry unendurable.

M. MAXIME DU CAMP treats his subject in the true spirit of classificatory science. As a botanist might distribute an order of plants into its families, genera, species and sub-species, so he divides the thieves' clan into its several groups. Of these he recounts about twenty. They differ much in character, in pursuits and in social status; for the thieves' clan is a hierarchy. But they have one thing in common—language; their argot has a history of many centuries. M. MAXIME DU CAMP finds its sources in the free companies which wandered over France after the disbanding of its armies in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The language of the gypsies forms a large part of this patois, into which words from other foreign tongues enter. The chief of a company of thieves is called meg or mek, by contraction, according to M. DU CAMP, from the Latin magus, Arabic malek (king); the executioner is tollard, from the Latin tollere, quia tollit a vivis. In the thieves' argot, the word for pardon is redam, from the Latin redimere, to redeem. In it years are berges, from the German berg, (mountains,) symbolizing the difficult ascent of their arduous life. Other metaphors are more obvious. To speak is balancer le chiffon rouge, "to wave the red rag"—that is, the tongue. To peach upon a comrade is judacer, to play the Judas. By an old concession, the Court of Assizes is la juste (the just one.) The Legislative Body is "the Tower of Babel;" an omnibus, "the common oven;" the grating of the prison windows is "the harp." The gendarmes are the "dealers in lace, (or, by an ambiguity,) snares—marchands de lacets. The guillotine was Abbaye de monte-à-regret, or, as we might say, the Abbey of Sorrowful Ascent. Now, from the five slabs placed in the middle of the pavement of the Place de la Roquette, it is called the Abbey of the Five Stones. In the hierarchy of the thieves' clan the highest place is occupied by the faiseurs, or, as we should call them, swindlers, of whom Robert Macaire is the imaginative type, who in the days of their prosperity are flush of money and well dressed, frequent the operas and best restaurants, and who in their decline become the sellers of theatre checks, watchguards and photographs. Next follow "free burgesses," who obtain entrance into houses by professing to belong to the profession of the occupant, and who are ready to pick up anything that comes to hand.

The vol au poivrier, the theft from the pepper-caster, with which a thief's career generally begins, is robbery from a drunken man under pretence of assisting him. The tireur is our pickpocket, who haunts crowds at theatre doors, exhibitions and railway stations. He is generally accompanied by three or four lads—moucherons, little gnats, who indicate likely subjects to him. The triumph of this art is to make the tire à la chicane, that is, with the back turned to the person who is being plundered. Its greatest adept was MIMI LEPREUIL, who had acquired the honorable name of "the hand of gold." M. DU CHAMP gives an illustration of his skill. An immense crowd being assembled during the time of the Republic on the Place de la Bourse, the police agent on duty recognizing MIMI LEPREUIL required him to take himself away. That illustrious man refused, taking his stand upon his rights as a citizen. "Leave me alone," he said, "with your Republicans. I have rummaged in 500 pockets, and have not found a single sou."

The carreurs have their field of operation in jewelers' shops. The carreur generally affects to be short-sighted. "He examines the precious stones with extreme attention, closely, very closely—so closely that he touches them with his nose. His nose has been smeared with virgin wax; some diamonds stick to it, which are slipped promptly into the sharper's sleeve." Other practitioners use their tongues, hooting them out with the jewels like certain insect-catching animals with rapid and precise aim, or fix the stones to the palm of the hand with gum adraganth. The carreur, in throwing a couple of sous to an accomplice who acts the street beggar, often throws with them a valuable diamond. A single jeweler in the Palais Royal is said to have lost property to the value of £4,000 by the operation of two carreurs.—London Daily News.

COPYING MANUSCRIPTS.—Some time ago we gave an account of a mass of letters said to have been written by PASCAL, GALILEO and NEWTON, which have been palmed off on M. CHASLES as genuine, and which, if genuine, deprive NEWTON of the honor of all his great discoveries. That they are forgeries, and not very clever forgeries, few men of distinction, even in France, have any doubt, although the motive of the forgery is obviously to give PASCAL the credit of having made most of NEWTON'S discoveries. Some letters, which it is pretended were written by MILTON, have also turned up, and were published in last month's Frazer's Magazine. It was instantly shown that these last were undoubted forgeries, and the source of some of them was very clearly indicated. We refer to this matter only to mention that a means has been discovered of deciding upon the age of a document, up, at all events, to a certain time; and now it can be easily determined whether these documents are recent forgeries. M. CARRE, the discoverer of this process, seems to have experimented with manuscripts of various ages. According to the lapse of time since the manuscript was written, he obtained fainter and fainter copies, until he came to a document dated 1789, of which he could obtain no copy at all. It may be accepted as a proof of the good faith of M. CHASLES (of which, indeed, we have no doubt,) that as soon as he heard of the process he offered some of his numerous letters to be submitted to the proof, and we hope soon to learn whether or not M. CARRE has succeeded in obtaining copies. The process is of a very simple kind, and, to say the truth, we are not disposed to put much faith in it. It is, in fact, nothing more than the ordinary mode by the press, but, in place of using simple water, M. CARRE wets the document to be copied with dilute hydrochloric acid. What changes take place in ink, which prevent us from obtaining a copy of a letter more than eighty years old, it is impossible to say. But supposing that ink containing iron has been used—and such inks appear to have been employed in Europe even in the time of PLINY—it might be expected after the application of hydrochloric acid an impression of a document of any date could be procured, which would be brought out and blackened on the application of a solution of tannin. This is, however, beside the present question, and we shall wait with some impatience to know the results of M. CARRE'S experiments.—Mechanics' Magazine.

AFFAIRS IN GEORGIA.

The Late Henry J. Raymond—Tribute to His Memory—His Vindication of the People of Georgia—The Legislature and the Question of Negro Eligibility—Excellent Aspect of the Cotton Crop.

From Our Own Correspondent.

AUGUSTA, Ga., Tuesday, June 22, 1869.

I have been shocked and pained beyond measure by the sudden death of MR. RAYMOND. For many years an intimate personal friendship existed between us, and I had ample opportunity to observe and admire, not only his brilliant talent and varied information, but the kindliness of heart, genial good-fellowship and generosity of disposition which characterized him in his intercourse with his fellow men. Far abler pens than mine will record his public services and his private virtues, but I should do violence to my feelings were I to refrain from laying my humble but heartfelt tribute of respect, regard and admiration upon the newly-made grave of my friend HENRY J. RAYMOND.

At all times the death of such a man would be a grievous loss to the country, but at this time it is a national calamity. Having risen far above the level of party politics, occupying the heights of patriotic statesmanship, he always used his great talent and widespread influence to vindicate justice and maintain truth, to counsel conciliation and tolerance, to defend the weak and the suffering, and to restore perfect peace among all the States of the Union. His recent masterly vindication of the people of Georgia against the slanders which have been spoken and written concerning them, won for him their gratitude and esteem, and however widely they may have differed from him on purely party questions, they will mourn his loss as that of a disinterested friend, who had the power and the will to protect them from wrong and injustice.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

It is confidently stated by those who profess to be best informed as to the plans and policy of Governor BULLOCK, that he will speedily convene a special session of the General Assembly, with a view to ascertain the purposes of that body in regard to the eligibility of negroes to office, now that the Supreme Court of the State has pronounced its judgment. The demand which Governor BULLOCK will present is that both Houses shall recall and reseat the negro members whom they expelled nearly a year ago; and the question is, will the majority of the Senate and House of Representatives, recognizing the judgment of the Supreme Court as a reversal of their decision, yield to the Governor, or will they refuse to give retroactive effect to the Supreme Court's constitutional exposition, merely acknowledging its binding force for the future? I am rather inclined to the belief that a majority of the members of the General Assembly will be in favor of this latter course. They will maintain their constitutional right to be exclusive judges of the eligibility of their own members, but, acknowledging the opinion of the Supreme Court as binding for the future, will obey the law, and admit to their seats any negroes who may be hereafter elected legally to either House.

THE STATE SENATORS.

They will be the more inclined to follow this course, as it is very generally whispered that it is the purpose of certain parties, in case the expelled negroes are restored to their seats, to annul the election of United States Senators—or rather to make a new election, with the view of electing RUFUS B. BULLOCK and FOSTER BLODGETT to the seats now claimed by JOSHUA HILL and H. V. M. MILLER. Of the two evils—appearing to disobey the law as pronounced by the Supreme Court, by refusing to reseat the expelled negroes, or aiding in electing BULLOCK and BLODGETT to the Senate by admitting the negroes—the Legislature will probably deem the first-named to be the lesser.

Nowhere is there manifested the least disposition to resist or even complain of the judgment of the Supreme Court. Indeed, long before it was delivered it was well ascertained how Chief Justice BROWN and Mr. MCCAY would decide. It was generally believed that Judge WARNER would decide otherwise than he did. It was supposed that he would agree with the Court, although his reasoning might be different from that of the other Judges.

THE RECENT MURDERS.

The murder of Mr. ROBERT FLOURNOY by one of his negro laborers has caused some excitement, and the assassination of Mr. LEWIS by another negro, so soon after, has tended to increase the alarm. Mr. FLOURNOY was a young man of considerable promise. He belonged to an old and distinguished family, and was personally very popular. He was a very amiable person, a most indulgent employer, and had successfully and without fee defended the negro who killed him, when tried for some crime.

AFFAIRS THROUGHOUT THE STATE.

Perfect quiet and good order exist in Warren County. The troops and the people are, as I am informed, getting on admirably together, and the leading citizens are coöperating with the commanding officer in keeping the peace, and in detecting all law-breakers. Since Judge GARNETT ANDREWS enjoined Mr. CHAA. NORRIS in his pretended exercise of the powers of Sheriff, no arrest shave been made, and the law has been universally respected. It is maliciously untrue that the Judge is a "Kuklux authority," as I have seen it stated in a telegram to a Washington City paper. Judge ANDREWS is a prominent Republican, was a Union man during the war, and was appointed Judge by Governor BULLOCK.

It is rumored that the Governor will refuse to order an election for members of Congress this Fall, as provided for by the Code of Georgia. He holds that the members elected to the Fortieth Congress, having received his commission to the Forty-first, are de facto and de jure members, and that, therefore, there is no necessity for a popular election.

The Macon people are sorely puzzled by the conflicting dispatches as to TURNER and the Postmastership of their city. Now their hopes are raised by a telegram that General GRANT has revoked the obnoxious appointment, and then they are in despair by the receipt of another telegram announcing that TURNER has filed his bond and become duly qualified. Whatever may be TURNER'S merits, popularity with any class of the citizens of Macon is certainly not one of them. White and black, rich and poor, Democratic and Radical, are all opposed to his appointment.

THE CROPS.

The broiling Summer weather of the past week has made corn and cotton jump out of the ground. The crops are looking as well as the most sanguine could desire. As a general thing grass and weeds have been effectually killed for this year, and the hands and mules will soon enjoy a rest from active labor, which will, no doubt, be most acceptable to both. The wheat crop is said to be the largest that has been harvested in Georgia for many years. The prospect of the corn crop is excellent, and since cotton has sold for 30 to 31 cents per pound, with a well-grounded hope of its "staying" at that price, or thereabouts, the farmers' faces, which were beginning to elongate considerably a few weeks ago, have become round and smiling.

If Mr. Attorney-General HOAR would only give an opinion that Georgia's reconstruction is complete, I think that the smile would become fixed. QUONDAM.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Examinations in the Howard School for Freedmen—Prizes—Number of Students—Sexes—Colors—Teachers—How Supported—The University of South Carolina—Examinations—Schools in the Institution—Fourth of July.

From Our Own Correspondent.

COLUMBIA, Monday, June 28, 1869.

Educational institutions of all kinds are bringing their annual sessions to a close. The oppressive heat of these last days of June makes this a pleasant thing for both teachers and taught.

THE HOWARD (FREEDMEN) SCHOOL.

The annual session of this benevolent institution for the education of colored children has just been brought to a close. The examinations have lasted three days. The first was devoted to the primary or abecedarian department, including spelling and easy reading, with a little mental arithmetic. The second day was given to the examination of the intermediate department, which rises higher than the primary in all the branches of that department, and adds geography. The third day was given to the higher department, which consists of the most advanced pupils, and adds English grammar to the curriculum of the intermediate. There were various prizes awarded, but they always combined moral with intellectual grounds in awarding these prizes. For example, two prizes were awarded in the higher department for "Excellence in Scholarship and Deportment;" one for "Uniform Politeness and respectful Behavior;" two for "Punctuality," and one for the most credite—marks of approval for both recitations and deportment. Besides these six, there were only four other prizes awarded; and these were to the intermediate department, for similar reasons. From conversations with the teachers I learn that these colored children get on well with memory studies; such as spelling, reading and topal geography, while they were slower at arithmetic and grammar—studies that require the logical faculties united with the memory. The attainments exhibited at the examination were quite moderate, but very well for that race. The recitations in public, while they indicated limited attainments on the parts of the pupils, plainly exhibited the fact that the duty of the teachers had been remarkably well performed. They had been well taught; and all the shortcomings are clearly referable to the negroes' inferior brain.

The maximum number of pupils for any one month during the past session was 600, of whom about 275 were boys and 325 girls. The number at the close of the session was considerably less than that; probably not above 400. The maximum number—600—were about one-third, or rather less, negroes, and the rest mixed. They keep no registry which distinguishes the color of the pupils; but judging from the number that were examined in the higher department, and applying the ratios to the whole 600, as one of the teachers thought would be fair, I find that there are 200 negro children; 85 black quadroons, or three-fourths black; 135 mulattoes; and 185 white quadroons, or one-fourth black. This last class of white quadroons includes all who are whiter than mulattoes or half-breeds, and some of these are so white as to make it in some instances very difficult to say that they are not white. This difficulty occurs whenever the three conditions of admixture of races concur in one individual, and all fall upon the side of white; that is, whenever the skin, the features, and the hair are all Saxon. There were three or four so white as this among the pupils of the Howard School just examined.

The school has now ten teachers—nine white and one colored—all female. The principal, Miss AUGUSTA HALEY, is earnestly devoted to her work, and deserves much credit for its success. The house in which the school is taught belongs to the United States Government, having been built for the Freedmen's Bureau. The teachers have hitherto been mainly supported by the New-York branch of the Freedmen's Union Commission; and latterly, to some extent, by the Presbyterian Freedmen's Society of New-York. It is understood that this latter institution is making arrangements to take the management almost entirely in their hands. One of the teachers is supported by a gentleman of Hartford, Conn.—Mr. CLARKE—who employs this lady out of his own private funds.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA UNIVERSITY.

This State institution for whites has, in the last eleven days, held its annual and final examinations, preparatory to the Commencement, which comes off to-morrow, on what is called the Public Day. The University has ten schools—eight academic, one law and one medical. There were only fifty-three students presented for examination.

These are distributed variously through the several schools. The Chairman of the Faculty, Professor R. W. BARNWELL, has charge of the chair of History. In this school 23 were examined, of whom 18 took first-class; 8 graduating. In the School of Ancient Languages, 25 were examined, of whom 21 took first-class; 14 graduating. In Modern Languges, 20 were examined, of whom 13 attained first-class; 11 graduating. In English Language, 22 were examined, of whom 18 attained the first class; 10 graduating. In Mathematics, 27 were examined, of whom 11 attained the first class; 3 graduating. In Natural Philosophy, 5 were examined; 3 graduating. In Chemistry, 16 were examined; 13 graduating. In Law, the resignation of the Professor left the chair vacant, so that there was no examination. In Medicine, 3 were examined, all graduating. It is understood that 6 will apply to-morrow for the degree of Bachelor of Arts, of whom 4 will probably attain it. These examinations have been made unusually severe, in order to raise the standard of education which lapsed a little lower than was its usual grade by the war.

The annual celebration is accompanied by a variety of entertainments, among which are a Commencement Ball, that promises to be a brilliant affair, and is the first ball of its kind given at the University; the valedictory orations of the Euphradian and Clariosophic Societies attached to the University.

THE FOURTH.

The colored population of Columbia and surrounding country are making preparations for one of the most showy and expensive celebrations on the Fourth of July, (on the third,) ever held here. The programme is spoken of as being comprehensive and attractive. It is of course a political move, for the purpose of popularizing their party and rendering the rustic laborer pleased with his affiliation with it. BOISE.

The Sentence of Thomas D. Carr to Death for the Murder of Miss Fox.

We mentioned on Saturday that THOMAS D. CARR, the murderer of Miss FOX, in Belmont County, Ohio, had been sentenced to be hanged. We are in receipt of the remarks made by Judge WAY in discharging the solemn duty imposed on him by law. CARR was brought into Court and told to stand up. When asked if he had anything to say why the sentence of the law should not be passed on him, he answered, "Nothing." Judge WAY then addressed him as follows:

"THOS. D. CARR, a jury of your fellow-citizens, almost selected by yourself, upon their oaths have found you guilty of the willful, deliberate, premeditated and malicious murder of LOUISA C. FOX. In our judgment the verdict is fully warranted by the evidence in the case, and accords with the truth. The undisputed facts proven present a case of more than ordinary enormity, without being alleviated by a single mitigating circumstance. Your victim, a child in years, because she refused to marry you, was murdered in a most shocking manner, her head being almost severed from her body. Your sole and only defence, that of moral insanity, ably and eloquently argued by your counsel upon the trial, failed to convince the jury that you should be acquitted. The testimony upon this subject with its most favorable construction, only tended to prove that you were petulant, ill-natured, irritable, of a nervous temperament, and possessed of a heart fatally bent on mischief. The jury, upon their oaths, have conscientiously discharged their duty. No efforts have been spared to obtain an acquittal by the able and learned counsel assigned for your defence. The verdict of the jury imposes a painful duty on the Court; but, in the administration of the law, it must be performed. Our law-givers having it in their power to direct and govern society, have determined that justice requires that 'whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by men shall his be shed,' not in a spirit of vengeance, but that others, warned by the example, may be afraid to commit crime. Your unfortunate victim cannot be restored to life by any fears of repentance, or by any contrition of heart. The crime which you have committed can only be expiated by the judgment of the law. It is, that you be taken from hence to the jail of the county, and that you be safely kept. That on Friday, the 20th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1869, you be taken to the place of execution, and between the hours of 9 o'clock in the morning and 4 o'clock in the evening of that day, that you be hanged by the neck till you are dead. May God have mercy on you."

During the delivery of this charge, the prisoner listened calmly, appearing to take very little interest in the proceedings, and the whole time he was in the Court-house he manifested no emotion whatever, except a slight nervous twitching when he first entered.

PRINCETON COLLEGE.

The Decennial Meeting of the Class of 1859—Class Prize Foundation—The Class Gun—Reunion—Cup Presentation—Adoption of Class Boy—The Banquet.

From an Occasional Correspondent.

PRINCETON, N. J., Friday, July 2, 1869.

This class held its first general reunion since graduation during Tuesday and Wednesday of this week, in what is familiarly known as "the Museum." By the kindness of the authorities the building had been set apart for the exclusive use of the class, and was made conspicuous by a beautiful transparency bearing the inscription, "Headquarters of the Class of 1859." As only a brief mention of the reunion has been made in the TIMES, I send you something of a report.

The class gathering was a complete success. Men had come all the way from Alabama, from Mississippi and other Southern States; from the West and from the North, once more to testify their affection for their literary mother. At the business-meeting of Tuesday morning the class consummated a plan which has occupied much of its attention and interest, viz., the establishment of a Prize Foundation of $2,000, the interest of which is to be given to the member of the Senior Class who shall stand the best examination in English literature and essay writing.

THE CLASS GUN.

The exercises around the "Class Gun," late in the afternoon of Tuesday, were attended by a large concourse of distinguished visitors and proved to be a most attractive feature of this Commencement. This gun was a revolutionary relic, and the first to announce in Princeton the triumph of the American arms in the war of 1812. It had long been used by the students for Fourth of July salutes, until worn out by frequent use it was, with the usual ingratitude to public servants, allowed to lie neglectedly in the front campus. Soon after it was appropriated by the town as a corner post, and stood for twenty-eight years at the intersection of Nassau and Witherspoon streets. Thence it was removed by the Class of 1859 to its present position in the College campus. This feat was accomplished one night during the senior year of the class, amid a drenching rain, and notwithstanding other obstacles which would have deterred hearts less earnest and wills less invincible. Its removal caused an intense excitement among the lower classes of the townspeople, rendering it needful to guard the sacred relic for many weeks. We are informed, however, that the affair met with the cordial approbation of the more respectable portion of the citizens, as it did with the concurrence of the College authorities. It seemed to the class every way proper that they should signalize their pride in their coup d'etat on their reassembling after ten years' absence, by a solemn dedication.

The exercises were opened by a brief address from the Class President, Mr. HUGH L. COLE, of Mobile, Ala., whereupon a historical sketch of the gun was read by Mr. G. W. KETCHAM, of New-Jersey. Some very appropriate lines were then read by Mr. WM. B. WRIGHT, of New-York. They were a species of heroic verse admirably conceived, and happily weaving in the facts already recounted by the historian. An oration was next pronounced by Mr. THOMAS MCKAIG, of Maryland, who in a felicitous manner connected the history of the gun from revolutionary times with the history of the College, and ably showed that like WILLIAM of Nassau, after whom Nassau Hall is named, the best scholars are always the truest patriots. Leaving the gun to the fostering care of the undergraduates, the class adjourned to headquarters.

THE REUNION PROPER.

The great event of the Decennial was the "reunion," which took place at 10½ o'clock on Tuesday evening. It was open to invited guests only and long before the hour for assembling, the room was filled to its utmost capacity. The seats immediately around the platform were occupied by the class. Next were placed the Trustees, Faculty and distinguished friends of the Institution. Many lady friends of the class in Princeton and from abroad, by their bright smiles and gay attire added éclat to the occasion. President MCCOSH and the Class President occupied the rostrum. Dr. MCCOSH, in his usual dignified and genial manner, welcomed the class home again, and expressed in warm terms the gratification of the officers of the University at the presence of so many of the Class of 1859—a class which had specially endeared itself to the Institution as being the first to establish a prize. Mr. COLE, the Class President, gracefully responded to the earnest words of welcome, and then, turning to the class, in an address full of rich thought and deep feeling, reviewed the events so full of joy to some, and so full of sorrow to others, which had transpired since graduation. The scene was a touching one, when amid profound silence he alluded to the large proportion—one-fifth—of the class, who had gone to their last sleep, and pronounced slowly and tearfully their names. Mr. COLE'S main purpose was to prove, as he did conclusively, that Princeton, from her position and history, was peculiarly adapted to be the conservator of truth and justice in politics and religion.

THE CLASS-BOY.

The "cup" presentation was introduced by a report from the Class Secretary, Rev. ALFRED H. KELLOGG, of New-York City, who stated that of the thirty-one children of the class, the committee had decided that the cup should be awarded to JAMES RUCKS YERGER, Jr., son of JAMES R. YERGER, of Jackson, Miss., he being the oldest living child. Accordingly, "Jimmy Junior" was declared to be the "class boy," and his father "appointed guardian, charged with the sole management, education, and maintenance of the same." The "cup," which was a beautiful silver goblet lined with gold, bearing on one side an inscription and on the other the seals of the College, was presented in the name of the class by Rev. F. B. HODGE, of Wilkesbarre, Penn., in a speech witty and brilliant. In the necessary absence of the YERGERS, the cup was received by the class boy's representative, Dr. A. A. LYON, of Columbus, Miss. The address of Mr. C. B. MORRIS, of New-Jersey, representing the disappointed ones, was full of feeling, showing that the disappointment was sincere. That of Mr. T. C. LYON, of Columbus, Miss., representing the bachelors, which concluded the exercises, was too long, in view of the lateness of the hour and the intense heat of the room, although it was highly elaborated, evidencing careful preparation.

Next came the "banquet," served in magnificent style, though as none but the class were admitted, we can say nothing of the "toasts" as announced on the programme. A business meeting on Wednesday closed the highly interesting exercises of this reunion.

A Thanksgiving Day in Missouri.

Governor MCCLURG, of Missouri, has issued the following proclamation for a day of thanksgiving:

Desiring the usual and proper observance of the Fourth day of July, in commemoration of our national independence, which day this year falls upon Sunday, and, as there is in our State no law providing for its observance on any other than the calendar day; that in its observance, bankers and others interested in the payment of "bonds, bills of exchange or promissory notes," may freely participate, such payments to be deemed due and demandable on the Saturday preceding the day hereto designated, and to bring said day clearly within our statute law as per section 19 of chapter 86 of the General Statutes of 1865, I hereby recommend that Monday, the 5th, be observed as the Fourth day of July next, and I hereby appoint said 5th day as a day of public thanksgiving. Let all Christian families, if not in public worship, at least in their respective households, bow before Almighty God, who holds the destinies of nations in His hand, and thank Him for His abundant mercies, and especially for the independence and freedom we enjoy.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at Jefferson City, this 26th day of June, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-third. J. W. MCCLURG.

By the Governor:—FRANCIS W. RODMAN, Secretary of State.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Our Courts—How Injury Can be Openly Inflicted.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I desire to call your attention and that of your readers to the manner in which an injury can be openly inflicted in our Courts without an opportunity for redress.

In the Marine Court, contrary to the rules of the higher tribunals, costs and disbursements can be taxed without notice to the adverse party, and execution at once issued thereon, when no opportunity can be had to alter or correct any overcharge that may be made in the way of disbursements. To illustrate: A judgment was recovered on the 9th of June, in a case tried in said Court, by a defendant. At the trial there was only one witness and the defendant. The statute requires, and the authorities rule, that an affidavit of disbursements must be filed before or at the time of taxing therein before the Clerk; and in cases where mileage is desired for foreign witnesses or parties, an affidavit must be filed showing the distance traveled; and in case a party to the suit desires mileage, an affidavit must be given showing that the party attended solely as a witness, and not otherwise.

Notwithstanding this, no affidavit was filed—at least the Taxing Officer of that Court so states—and the fact that no such document can be found on the files of the Court is at least strong evidence of such fact; a charge of $33 28 was taxed for mileage where the defendant was only entitled to $16, providing that the proper papers had been presented.

Nevertheless, on a motion made by me in the case to correct the taxation, the Court (no doubt technically correct) decided that the presumption was that the Clerk had done his duty and that the taxation was correct and could not be disturbed, and therefore refused to allow the deduction to be made. By this means, attorneys with india rubber consciences can easily make additional fees, in the way of disbursements, with impunity, the adverse party has no notice, and even if an affidavit is filed, there is no opportunity to dispute it, as is the case in Courts of Record. Would it not be advisable that a rule be made that costs should only be taxed on notice, so that the opportunity to commit this injustice be avoided?

Costs form an important item in suits at law, and the Marine Court, which conducts its business so expeditiously and honestly in the trial therein had, should not become, however innocently, the vehicle of injustice and extortion.

Jumping from City Cars.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

A very prudent article appeared in the Commercial Advertiser a few days ago, advising the public to avoid jumping from City cars,—reporting injuries, &c. Soon after, in the same paper of the 18th inst., was published another communication which stated that, "if people will jump from cars while in motion, they should first take hold of the iron handle which is attached to the cars, and jump forward toward the horses, and not let go their hold of the car-handle until they attain safe support below. Passengers are apt to jump in the wrong direction, and then fall."

Such, too, are my views, and the NEW-YORK TIMES, in an article on the same subject, reports a portion of the above approvingly in their paper of the 19th inst.

On the 27th instant appeared a reply to the TIMES, in that paper, signed "Civil Engineer," entitled, "How to jump from a moving car," which we inclose, and which, if any person undertakes to follow the ambiguous instructions given therein, he would, probably, soon find himself lying "with his back to the field and his face to the stars." No! "Civil Engineer's" method is dangerous, and the only safe method to jump from a horse-car in motion, is to take hold of the "guard rail" attached to the car and spring forward, in conformity with its velocity. But the conductors, after serving a week on the cars, can inform you; they know the best method. It is perfectly easy and safe to jump with the car in motion (not steam) when you knows how: and we dislike to see vigorous men stop the cars, aware that the stopping and starting is the hardest work for the team, for any thing of its delay. But none should jump with a parcel in hand.

NEW-YORK, Saturday, June 26. W.

California Gold.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Will you be good enough to tell me what becomes of the Gold product of California, amounting to about a million of dollars a week? Formerly, if I mistake not, we were in the receipt or a million of dollars in bullion twice a month by steamer from California; these shipments appear to have ceased entirely, or nearly so. Where is the gold and what absorbs it? Please answer A SUBSCRIBER.

In the aggregate, the shipments from San Francisco are not materially different from last year, but the direction varies considerably; they are more important to China and Japan direct by the mail steamers; they are somewhat larger of late to England direct; to New-York they have fallen off by sea, while the new route overland by the Pacific Road is now monopolizing full two-thirds, if not three-fourths, the gold forwarded to the New-York bankers.—TIMES.

Capture of a Wild Man in the Woods in Ohio.

From the Columbus (Ohio) Journal, June 29.

For some days there have been lurking in the neighborhood of Harrisburg, in this county, two wild or insane men, who, although they kept to the woods, succeeded by their strange manners and desperate acts in terrifying the inhabitants of the locality. They cut the throats of horses, cut off the ears of other animals, and would allow no human being to approach them. On Saturday one of the men was surrounded in the woods, and though he defended himself with a fence rail, he was, after a struggle, captured. He was bareheaded, barefoot and without coat. He refused to speak, would not tell his name, nor answer any question that was asked. He refused to eat, and showed such violence in manner that he was yesterday transferred to the custody of the Sheriff by W. BASHAW, Mayor of Harrisburg, and lodged in the county jail. After the building a close examination, seemed familiar with locks and cells, and tried the strength of the bars. His inspection concluded, he proceeded to trounce one of the prisoners in the hall with a broom. This was a two-handed game, in which the unknown, much to his astonishment, came out second best. He was finally locked in a cell, much against his will, refusing before this, however, to touch meat or drink. Once in the cell, he commenced operations on the bed, threw off the bed-clothes and finally the mattress, stretching himself on the iron bedstead. He is a man of medium size; hair dark and now long, but looks as though it had been cut close; whiskers short; eyes have a meaningless expression. He had not spoken a word last night since his capture, and paid but little attention to any one who approached his cell. It is supposed that he is an escaped lunatic from some asylum.

Two Rascals Arrested in Massachusetts.

From the Newburyport Herald, July 1.

About a month since a couple of sleepers were placed on the track of the Newburyport Railroad, at Georgetown, five minutes before the freight train passed, but instead of throwing the train off the track, the train threw them off, and passed on unscathed. About a week later a shoe shop belonging to JEREMIAH JONES, Esq., was broken into, and a quantity of goods stolen, and a lot of boots cut to pieces. A few days later the repair shop of the Boston and Maine Railroad was entered in the night time and all sorts of petty mischief perpetrated. It being deemed expedient to stop this rascality, Captain BOYNTON rallied in full force, and last Sunday found a half-fledged savage, 16 years of age, named WILLIAM DWYER, secreted in the woods near the Pentucket Pond, who, on being run down and captured, owned up to being the ringleader in all the above-named irregularities. He was taken before the Haverhill Police Court, where he pleaded guilty to all three charges. On Tuesday BOYNTON went to Pittsburg, where he made the acquaintance of one JOHN CRONIN, another juvenile reprobate, who was persuaded to pay a visit to Judge CARTER, before whom he pleaded guilty to being concerned in the robbery of the shop and the obstruction of the track. Both parties were held in $500 for their appearance before the Superior Court. DWYER seems to be a most unmitigated scamp, who has been "on his muscle" in a small way for a long time. When told by Captain BOYNTON that if he kept on his present course he would come to the gallows, he said he didn't care, for that was as good a way to die as any. He also admitted that when they had placed the pleapers on the track, they waited in ambush till the cars passed to see them smash up.

HOMBOURG.

Sights and Sensations at a German Gambling Town.

The following lively and luminous description of the fashionable gaming establishment at Hombourg, is from Sights and Sensations in France, Germany and Switzerland, by EDWARD GOULD BUFFUM—a brilliant and attractive book, elegantly gotten up, just published by HARPER & BROTHERS. The description has all the vividness and truth of reality, and brings to mind GUSTAVE DORÉ'S famous picture—"A Scene at the Gaming Tables"—with which our readers are doubtless familiar through the magnificent photographs of it which have recently been placed in the windows of some of our uptown book stores:

Hombourg is certainly a most charming watering-place, where nature and art seem to have vied with each other to realize the idea of an earthly paradise. It is situated nine miles from what was for centuries, and has continued until recently to be, the "Free City of Frankfort," the great money-mart of the Continent, but which now, thanks to BISMARCK and the needle-gun, has degenerated into a third-rate Prussian town. On one side of it rise the blue Taunus Mountains, from whose summits invigorating breezes blow down, and on the other stretches far away toward the Main a broad, extended, fertile plain, dotted with pretty farm-houses, whose roofs rise isolated, like ships, from out a sea of grain. On the mountain-side are thick, dark forests of oak and pine, beneath whose shade long, level, cool, delightful walks and drives lead up to the very mountain summit, and at convenient distances are several little German villages, in which the people still retain their queer, ancient dress and customs, the women wearing the odd-looking German cap, and skirts of even more than fashionable brevity, and the men remarkable swallow-tailed blue coats, with the waists in the immediate vicinity of the shoulders; here are lakes, on whose fair bosoms swans are floating; charming little bosquets in which, without much stretch of the imagination, mischievous, wicked Cupids may be supposed to flit from branch to branch; parks filled with tame deer, which accept with pleasure their daily bread from the hand of the visitor; five mineral springs, whose waters are recommended as sovereign in all diseases of the stomach and liver.

But it is neither the blue Taunus, nor the pure air, nor the darkling forests of oak, nor the sweet exhalations of the pine, borne on the wings of the Summer breeze, nor the queer caps and swallow-tailed coats, nor the gardens and lawns, nor flowers, nor swans, nor Cupids, nor deer, nor even the world-renowned invigorating waters—it is not any or all of these combined—that form the principal inducement to the fifteen or twenty thousand people who spend a portion of the Summer at Hombourg. A more powerful, irresistible attraction than any of these—a fascination which, once yielded to, holds, and binds, and charms, until it destroys its victim—draws the large majority of those who visit this, the most extensive and dangerous of the public gaming-hells of Europe. No one unfamiliar with the great and striking "specialty" of Hombourg would ever imagine that here so many pockets were annually drained, so many hearts and hopes crushed, so many ambitions destroyed, so many bright dreams changed to sad, hard realities.

Fronting upon the main street of the town, in the Florentine style of architecture, is the magnificent Kursaal, the temple of Fortune. Entering a spacious vestibule, treading upon a floor of richly-wrought mosaic, the visitor, after passing through a corridor, suddenly finds himself in a salon of palatial proportions and splendor. The united singing societies on this continent, composed of music-loving Germans, and organized as the North American Saengerbund, will hold a great singing festival in Cincinnati next Summer, similar to the one held in Chicago last year. The festival will occupy an entire week, and will consist of a series of mammoth concerts, out-door amusements, and excursions by rail and river. There will be representatives in attendance from all the States, from British America, and from Fatherland.

The Necessity of Amusements for the Poor.

It is very evident that our Central Park is not as much used by our poorer classes as it should be. There are throngs of people in it upon Sundays and holidays; but they are mainly Germans and French, and not of the poorest class. The crowds of Irish who pack the tenements in the Seventeenth Ward, and throng the liquor shops of the Sixth Ward, do not sufficiently make use of such a great pleasure and civilizer as is this beautiful park.

And it must be remembered that the advantage of frequent visits to such a pleasure ground is not confined to the visitors. One of the modern social truths, learned by much experience, is that a higher kind of pleasure drives out the taste for the lower. The gin shops erected around the Sydenham Palace in England, found themselves soon without business. The curiosities of the building and the gardens gave the common people a stimulus which they used to seek in drink. No one thing is more needed in our lowest quarters—such as the Five Points and Fourth Ward—than virtuous amusements or pleasant means of instruction. If the Five Points House of Industry could add to their new rooms, soon to be built, for chapel, dormitory, baths, and hospital, a large pleasant room for decent popular amusements, they would be doing quite as much for the improvement of the quarter as even by the chapel itself.

The "Children's Aid Society" are attempting to supply the want to a limited degree by "free reading-rooms," which are doing much good. But much more than this is needed. The class of amusements supplied now to the poor is nasty and odious. It is demoralizing to the last degree. Or if there be no amusements of even a pretence of decency, the young man and young girl seek their enjoyment in such places as the Water-street dance-cellars, or the innumerable liquor saloons. It is evident that the poor, like the rich, will have amusements; and if they be not furnished them of a decent and moral kind, they will inevitably have recourse to the indecent and immoral.

The Germans, on the whole, are a model to our working classes, of a rational pursuit of pleasure. The sight of their little family picnics, among all the woods, gardens and parks around the City, in the hot weather, is one refreshing to the moralist and humanitarian; and even in their more crowded gatherings the excesses are really nothing compared with the beastly indulgences which disgrace every day the American and Irish liquor shops. But in some way the German influence does not seem to impregnate out poorest class as it should. Their pleasures are still low and sensual, and threatening to public order.

We are confident that more might be done to elevate the tastes of our masses in this respect. And the obvious implement for this purpose—the most ready at hand and practical—would be a more frequent use of the Central Park. This pleasure ground contains now far more resources for amusement and instruction than formerly. The menagerie—poor as it is compared with European zoölogical gardens—is still very instructive to children and ignorant people. The playgrounds and boating and arbors and and houses for shelter, and the greater freedom allowed on the grass-plots, make it exceedingly pleasant for children and the laboring classes. The great obstacle to the poorest ranks frequenting it is the expense of reaching it. Twelve cents for each member of a working man's family, except the youngest, is a considerable outlay for a man earning only two or three dollars a day.

We could wish that the City railroads might find it convenient to fix a cheap day—say Saturdays in Summer—for Park excursions, so that throngs of women and children might be tempted to escape from their hot lanes and dirty alleys in the lowest wards to this beautiful resort. They could at least on that day take all children at half price; and there would thus be given to the coming generation the best of all education—the habit of innocent out-door amusement.

It might be possible for the Public School Board to arrange that on one day a week their children could purchase cheap tickets to the Park.

The importance of imbuing the vast mass of ignorant people growing up in our City with a taste for pure amusements cannot be exaggerated. Our almshouses, hospitals, reformatories and prisons are crowded with those who have been led to ruin by the thirst for amusement. Thousands of laborers' homes are made desolate, children are cast out to swell the fearful throng of thieves and prostitutes, many and many a woman's heart is broken, and many a life blighted, solely by the misdirection of this most natural appetite. It is this passion especially which lies behind the curse of drunkenness.

We trust that the attention of moralists and legislators will be called to this matter of providing amusement, as affecting profoundly the future interests of our whole community.

In Office and Out.

Bad as a certain newspaper correspondent's account of his recent "interview" with the late President was for the reputation of that distinguished gentleman, Mr. JOHNSON'S own speech, which followed hard upon the "interview," was very much worse. Upon the whole, nothing among those eccentric outbursts which marked the Presidential tour of 1866 equals this Washington speech. This is "swinging around the circle" with a vengeance.

And yet the remarkable thing connected with the whole speech is how flat it has fallen. Among our exchanges, we find it attracts little notice and hardly a comment. It comes in a dearth of news and at a lull in politics, when any sensation would be a relief; and yet, bitter, audacious, violent, and almost crazy as are its denunciations, it creates hardly a ripple on the sea of conversation, and dies away in a day amid dead calm. The reason is obvious; ANDREW JOHNSON, simple citizen, is not ANDREW JOHNSON, President; and much as he may say that he prefers the former title, he himself must be aware how his importance has dwindled with his exit from the White House. Such, however, is the uniform experience of Ex-Presidents; they relapse, or are expected to relapse, into comparative obscurity. So it is with FILLMORE and PIERCE, who might as well be dead for any influence they exert on American politics, and so it was with those who are dead—BUCHANAN, POLK, TYLER, VAN BUREN, and so on up toward the fountain-head of Presidents. If JOHN QUINCY ADAMS be an exception, it is known his nature was exceptional.

Ex-President JOHNSON struggles hard to keep himself from the oblivion which wrapped his predecessors. What violence and virulence can do, he does not leave undone; his parting speech as President was a sort of spasmodic protest against being plunged with his predecessors into Lethe; but the fates are strong against him, and neither roaring rant nor real wrong can long avail to keep him above the merciless waves. He called Congress "tyrants," and declared he would prefer "one individual" to a body so "corrupt," but nobody cared for his preference. In an elaborate figure he styled GRANT a "goose," but nobody was more disturbed than when the World calls GRANT a "monkey"—one fellow in the crowd, only, sings out in coarse, punning response, "You're sound on the goose," in a cutting allusion to the trade, rather than the tirade, of the speaker. Mr. JOHNSON made himself ridiculous by denying even GRANT'S exploits as a soldier, calling him "a little fellow who walked with a supply train;" but a jesting shout, "how about the hazel nut," was the only response from the crowd. In brief, this display of Mr. JOHNSON may be described as a contemptible failure; and when he tries to relieve it into something like decency and dignity, by mouthing "Erect your altar, and lay your Constitution upon it, and, if necessary, lay me also upon it," we only reply, with perfect good-nature, but with some feeling of being bored, that we don't wish to "erect an altar," neither do we desire to "lay the Constitution upon it;" and least of all do we long to lay Mr. JOHNSON upon it, but rather would suggest that he should go quietly back to Tennessee, while his successor administers the Government which he undertook to administer during four years, now, happily, gone.

The Irish Church Bill—The Last Tory Defeat.

We recently commented on the alleged determination of the Tories to devote their undivided energy to the support of the "concurrent endowment" or "leveling up" policy with regard to the Irish Church, and expressed our doubts as to whether it was possible that they could seriously entertain the idea of so completely subverting the fundamental principle of Mr. GLADSTONE'S bill. But, according to later advices, it appears that not only the leaders of the Tory Party proper, but many of the independent, and a considerable section of the so-called Liberal peers, actually took up "concurrent endowment" as their war cry, but were defeated by a vote of 146 to 113. They found able champions in the renegade Liberal Ex-Lord Chancellor Lord WESTBURY, and that great great Whig potentate, the Duke of CLEVELAND. The Marquis of SALISBURY and the Earl of CARNARVON, the two leaders of the Conservative "Cave" which voted for the second reading, and several distinguished Liberals, declared in favor of the principle of "concurrent endowment." But prudence and good sense have triumphed once more in their Lordships' counsels. The success of the Duke of CLEVELAND'S amendment would assuredly have brought about a conflict between the two Houses almost as serious as that which would have ensued had the motion for the second reading been rejected.

It is satisfactory to find that a very serious complication has thus been avoided. The House of Commons had voted the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, and proposed to secularize its revenues. The House of Lords had affirmed the principle of the bill as far as disestablishment and disendowment go, but the Tories intended, if possible, to divert the revenues of the Irish Church to ends widely different from those contemplated by the Commons. By the terms of the Duke of CLEVELAND'S amendment, Roman Catholics, Episcopalians and Presbyterians were alike to be "endowed" with a large share of the funds of the condemned Establishment. Had that amendment been carried, Mr. GLADSTONE'S main object—the removal of an Irish national grievance and the establishment of religious tranquillity throughout the country by the equalization of all denominations—would have been frustrated, and it cannot be supposed that the Lower House would have tamely submitted to having the will of the people thus set at naught.

It is now clear that the enemies of the bill, both open and disguised, have struck their last blow. The friends of the Irish Church have succeeded in prolonging its existence from 1871, the date originally proposed for its overthrow, until the following year, and in preserving their seats in the House of Lords for the Irish Bishops. But the struggle on the vital principles of the bill is now over, and we do not apprehend that anything can now occur to prevent its receiving the Royal assent, and being placed on the Statute Book of Great Britain before the close of the present month.

Woman's Position in England and America.

A very strong point made by Mr. MILL, in his book on "The Subject Condition of Women," in favor of female suffrage, is that the present position of woman in marriage weakens self-control in man in small matters and permits some of his worst qualities to break forth. The whole direction of modern society, he states, is not so much to cultivate generosity to inferiors or reverence to superiors, as self-control among equals. The best influence of social intercourse is in the restraint thrown over every person's whims or moods or ill-temper, and the self-command and consideration for others, all are obliged to exercise.

It is well known that if men are in the daily habit of associating only with inferiors, they fall into some of the worse faults of the masculine character. Now, the relation of wife to husband, MILL argues, is essentially one of an inferior—even of a slave. Her property is his, her wages belong to him, her children are her husband's; and she has no legal existence except in him. The idea which is carefully cultivated of her position is that she has "a subject nature," and is inferior to the man. She must be subject to all his whims, and however odious he may happen to be to her, she must yield, even more than a slave, to his passions. The consequence of all this, he urges, is that a man whose every word and look is under control during the day, among equals, who would lose all caste and respect if he permitted himself any moodiness or temper among men, whose aim with other men is to show the consideration which the society of equals demands, as soon as he returns to his home in the evening becomes a domestic tyrant. He addresses his wife as he does no equal, he does not restrain his temper, he is moody or snappish, he shows little of the consideration or courtesy that societyrequires elsewhere, and his whole manner proves that he regards his wife not as a partner or equal, but as an inferior—a kind of housekeeper or upper servant. This position being assigned her, she undoubtedly somewhat assimilates herself to it, and has scarcely a thought for the higher interests of her husband. The subjects that he converses on with his friends are not interesting to her, and she seems to live on a lower grade of life and society.

If he be tyrannical or brutal, she may have to submit to treatment (which cannot be redressed in law) that embitters her whole life. Mr. MILL argues that this relation of superior to inferior, which is most injurious to both husband and wife, can be in great part done away with by making woman the political and business equal with man. If the professions and trades be opened to her, and suffrage be granted and legal disabilities be removed, she at once steps upon an equal platform with man. If she marry, the ideal of marriage will then be attained, "a partnership among equals," and the husband will treat the wife as any gentleman or ordinary man treats his equal. He will show the same consideration and self-control at home that he shows in society, and courtesy and attention will even more charactereize the relations of the sexes then than now. Indeed, Mr. MILL more than hints that one great cause of the opposition of vulgar men to female suffrage is the dread that women will become their equals.

In taking up this line of argument, Mr. MILL has evidently had too much in view the relations of the sexes in England alone—and especially in the English middle and lower classes.

If he had but regarded French society, with which he must be familiar, he must have recognized the very different position of the French woman from that which he has so vividly pictured in England.

It is true that the idea of marriage is somewhat different, but certainly woman in France has anything but an inferior position. In the middle and lower class, she controls a great deal of business and outside affairs, and in the higher, she has always been one of the leading social powers—controlling and influencing politics, and art and literature. And however weak a Frenchman's moral bonds in marriage may be, he seldom forgets with his wife that he is associating with an equal, or, indeed, in some matters, a superior. The English domestic brutality or moodiness, we believe, is seldom known in France. Again in America, with whose social life Mr. MILL is probably less familiar, woman, though having no direct political power, is everywhere considered the equal, and in her own field the superior of man. An American wife shares almost all her husband's interests and thoughts, whether on public or private matters. She is an equal and member in his masculine society. She has only too much influence over his views and his actions. In thousands of families she leads in intellectual pursuits, supplying the busied man with thoughts and topics on innumerable outside matters which he never has leisure to look into. In her own sphere—the steering the household through the storms or troubles of everyday life—she is leader and principal. Her moral influence in this country, on men, is beyond all estimate, and in the late civil war acted with immense power on both parties. Her legal position here is daily improving, and in many States is all that the most ultra-reformers could desire. It is only just and moderate to say that the American idea of marriage is especially that of "a partnership among equals;" and that moodiness and tyranny at home are not much oftener exercised by one sex than the other. Woman in the United States, without suffrage, has attained almost all the influence which Mr. MILL could desire for her. What is lacking will be completed best by mental education. The danger to be apprehended is that political power would only weaken it.

Taxation and Misgovernment in Brooklyn.

We print in another column an article from the Brooklyn Eagle, elicited by one published in our issue of the 27th ult., on "Excessive Taxation in Brooklyn." In our article we showed that the rate of taxation in that city had regularly increased at about twenty per cent. annually for the last six years, until it had finally reached four and a half per cent. We then examined the causes of this rapid and unexampled increase, and demonstrated that while it was in great measure owing to the extravagance of some and to the venal corruption of others of her officials, yet to a much greater extent it was due to the anomalous position which Brooklyn occupies among great cities, having all their expenses and comparatively but little of their wealth. The reason of this is obvious. Brooklyn is a city of residences, having in herself but little commercial wealth. The great mass of her citizens are engaged in business in this City, where their wealth is largely invested, and where it is taxed for the benefit of its local improvements. Yet Brooklyn has the same expenses in schools, in streets, and in all things pertaining to a municipal form of government which she would have were all this wealth located within her own boundaries and taxed for her benefit. We suggested that the root of Brooklyn's financial difficulty was to be found in her separate corporate existence.

Our article immediately attracted the attention of the Brooklyn Press. The Union sees in our views a "frank and definite discussion" of the subject, and lays our entire article before its readers. While the Eagle, a Democratic paper, recognizing in the force of our statements reasons why the tax-payers of Brooklyn should seek relief from the heavy burdens which now oppress them in annexation to New-York, but, being unable either to deny our facts or answer our arguments, contents itself with accusing us of hostility to Brooklyn interests. We assure the Eagle that we are not hostile to Brooklyn, but a friend who is always glad to speak well of her when we can; too good a friend, indeed, not to call the attention of her people to the fearful manner in which they are being misgoverned, and to warn them in time to enable them, if they will, to avert a financial calamity greater than ever before befell so fair a city. Her growth, it is true, has been marvelous even among American cities. She has neither the extremes of wealth or poverty which characterize New-York; but in intelligence, morality, general thrift and enterprise, and in most of the qualities that make a city desirable as a place of residence, we know of none that surpasses her. But her taxes are positively fearful, and unless the rapid increase which has been going on for the last six years can be checked, must at no distant day seriously interfere with her growth and prosperity. To show that we do not overdraw the picture, nor state anything that is not confirmed by the testimony of her own officials, we quote from the Mayor's annual Message for 1869.

After showing that the present debt of the City is $18,559,250, and that of Kings County over $4,000,000, he states that the amount demanded for county purposes this year is $1,600,000, an excess of $524,725 11 over that required for the previous year, and $1,150,000 more than was expended in 1863. He further says, "with only five years more of increased outlay in the proportion which has prevailed since 1863, our rate of taxation will exceed seven per cent." "And," continues the Mayor, "every man can see that with taxes over seven per cent. upon our valuation capital, and even citizens seeking merely a residence would avoid Brooklyn as a plague spot."

If we are actuated by hostility to Brooklyn for merely publishing a truthful statement of her financial condition, what does the Eagle say of its Democratic Mayor?

This year when the Assessors had completed their assessment, and the amount of money to be raised had been ascertained, it was found that the rate of taxation would be four and a half per cent. We stated that the effect of a rate of taxation so excessive would be to drive from Brooklyn all incorporated and personal wealth. That banks and insurance companies could not stand up under it, and capital would be forced to seek a less exacting home. We also stated that to avoid this the Assessors increased the assessed valuation of the real estate of Brooklyn twenty-five per cent., the effect of which was to reduce the rate of taxation from four and a half to between three and four per cent., and thus relieve the banks and other personal property to the extent of this difference. That such was the true object of the movement will appear from the remarks of Assessor FIELD, made on introducing the resolutions, providing for the increased valuation. In describing the effect of keeping the rate at five and a half per cent., he says:

Third—We should lose all incorporated companies who can escape by removal of their principal offices. Insurance companies, banks, manufacturing organizations, railroads and other incorporated institutions, would find it impossible to stand up against the current which swept five per cent of their capital every year out of their coffers.

Fourth—We should lose almost the entire $18,000,000 of personal property now assessed; at least all that portion of it which could be invested in non-taxable bonds.

And in an interview between the State Assessors and the Assessors of Brooklyn, occurring since the publication of our previous article, Mr. FIELD stated what had already been the effect of a high rate of taxation upon Brooklyn. Many persons came here to reside, having small incomes, and invested in personal property, and when they found three and a half per cent. taken out, they left. There have been repeated instances of this kind.

In view of the foregoing, will the Eagle repeat its denial of our statement, that the reason of this increase was to be found in the desire of the officials of Brooklyn to satisfy and quiet the corporations and the owners of personal wealth, and thereby prevent the explosion which would certainly follow the withdrawal of their capital from its limits.

The old assessment of Brooklyn was too high; in proportion to its market value it was clearly assessed higher than any other portion of the State, except the City of New-York.

To equalize the assessment of the different counties of the State is the duty of State Assessors. Outside the Cities of New-York and Brooklyn, real estate is not assessed more than thirty per cent. of its market value, while the assessment of Brooklyn, before the late increase, stood at from thirty-five to forty per cent. Assessor FIELD, in introducing the resolution for the increase of of the valuation, says:

"The value of real estate in the City of Brooklyn has increased during the years 1868 and 1869—as evidenced by the record of sales—in so much greater ratio than the estimates made by this Board, that the assessed valuation now forms no more than thirty-five to forty per cent. on the average prices for which such real estate is sold."

He further says the

"State Board of Assessors have never assumed our valuation as the sum for which they debited the City of Brooklyn. It is almost uniformly from twenty-four to thirty millions less. The reasons they offer for this course will have no less weight should our valuation be increased. The State Assessors assert that Brooklyn is already valued at so much higher proportion than the country rates, that in equalizing the assessments throughout the State, they must give us the benefit of a lower assessment than we are willing to put upon ourselves."

This we think effectually disposes of the plausible pretexts that is now attempted to be put forth, that the reason for this sudden increase of valuation is to be found in the fact that the old valuation was absurdly low.

But if further evidence is required, it is furnished in the remarks of Assessor FIELD in an interview with the State Assessors, held since the publication of our former article:

"Therefore we want to impress it upon you by natural arguments that the fifty-one millions we have added to the real estate value is not representative capital; it does not represent additional value; it has no foundation except in theory."

We said the new valuation was fictitious. It will be seen Assessor FIELD says "it has no foundation except in theory."

The true reason of this increase is that stated by us in our former article. It is an attempt on the part of the Ring to play in Brooklyn the game so successfully played by the Ring in New-York. They hope by creating the flattering delusion that the property of tax-payers has greatly increased in value, and by taxing it at a low rate, to reconcile the people to their demands, and, by this means, to be enabled to continue their annual misappropriation of vast sums nominally applied to local improvements.

We have written in the hope of attracting the attention of the people of Brooklyn to the misgovernment of their city, and also to the great injury Brooklyn has suffered and must continue to suffer by the loss of that great proportion of her wealth which is invested in and taxed for the benefit of the local improvements of New-York.

Believing that substantial and permanent relief cannot be realized by any plan that does not give her the benefit of the annual revenues derived from that wealth, we suggested annexation. We do not urge it, nor are we sure New-York would favor it; but the advantages to Brooklyn of such relief, could she obtain it, are too manifest to require further argument.

The Close of the Fiscal Year.

The close of the fiscal year of 1868-9 shows a result far more gratifying than the predictions and estimates of six and nine months ago indicated. The total receipts from Internal Revenue for the year are officially reported at $158,287,176 81. Secretary MCCULLOCH'S estimate was $138,000,000; Commissioner WELLS' was $155,000,000. The receipts from customs, not yet officially given, will certainly reach $182,000,000. Mr. MCCULLOCH'S estimate was $174,000,000, and Mr. WELLS' $170,000,000. The total receipts from these two sources aggregate $340,000,000 against $312,000,000 as estimated by Mr. MCCULLOCH, and $322,000,000 as estimated by Mr. WELLS. To this must be added thirty millions as receipts from lands and miscellaneous sources, which brings the total up to $370,000,000, or nearly thirty millions more than the estimates of Mr. MCCULLOCH, ($341,000,000,) and thirteen millions more than the more careful and deliberate estimates of Mr. WELLS, ($356,700,000.) The public expenditures for the year are approximately given at $322,000,000, and will probably be within rather than above this figure. This leaves the handsome surplus of forty-eight millions as the result of the year's finances. What is still more gratifying and encouraging is that an analysis of the figures shows that by far the greater portion of this surplus has accumulated during the past four months, or since General GRANT'S administration came into power. The two features most notable in producing this result during this period are the reduction in the expenditure and the increase in the receipts of internal revenue. Certain logical causes have operated to increase the internal revenue during the closing months of the fiscal year, but the improvement is nevertheless so generally substantial as to give very solid promise for the future, especially when we note the fact that the receipts from distilled spirits for the year are nearly forty millions against fourteen millions for the previous year.

Secretary BOUTWELL has said within the past few days that there will be no difficulty in reducing the national debt by the sum of $50,000,000 during the first year of GRANT'S Administration. The financial outlook at the beginning of the new fiscal year abundantly warrants this assertion. The heads of the several Departments have devoted themselves energetically to reducing their expenditures to a point within the limits of the appropriations of Congress. The expenses of the army establishment alone have been reduced nearly $25,000,000 per annum, and if there be no costly Indian wars, there is a good prospect of being able to keep the War Department expenses within the limits fixed by the last appropriation of Congress—about $40,000,000. The estimated expenditures for 1869-70 were $303,000,000, and the estimated receipts $327,000,000. It is exceedingly probable that the expenditures will be kept within the appropriations, or, say, $290,000,000. And with increased efficiency in the collection of the revenue,—a certain result—with good crops, now almost assured, and an ordinary exemption from great calamities, it seems entirely safe to anticipate a total revenue for the ensuing fiscal year of $350,000,000, and a surplus at its close of fifty to sixty millions. This result will be placed beyond doubt by the time Congress reassembles, and must form the basis of whatever action shall be taken looking to a revision or reduction of taxation. The country certainly has cause for sincere congratulation at the situation as now presented, and the prospect for the future. The pledges of President GRANT'S inaugural are rapidly being fulfilled, and the people will not fail to place these facts in the balance against the complaints and criticisms engendered by personal spleen or disappointed ambition.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Police Commissioners have seen proper to order a redistribution of one-half of their Captains in New-York, and, it is to be presumed, have good and sufficient reasons for their action. The transfer of a Police Captain from a precinct where he has long held sway, may eradicate some abuses, but in some cases it would seem that it must entail at least temporary inefficiency, and the whole matter of transfers cannot therefore be considered as anything better than an experimeat. If the Captain of one precinct uses his position for underhanded private emolument, we can understand why his little arrangements should be broken up by his removal, but we do not consider that it is therefore necessary to also remove a Captain who does nothing of the kind, and in all respects performs his duties properly. The Commissioners, however, having ventured on this experiment, we hope that neither they nor the public, who are chiefly interested, will have any cause to complain of the result.

The Police Surgeons have not yet made any response to a resolution passed some days since by the Police Commissioners, requiring them to report the number of cases attended by each during the past years. As the surgeons have fallen under the suspicion, which is doubtless unmerited, of caring more for the emoluments of office than its duties, we trust they will respond to the resolution at the earliest moment, and thus put beyond question the amount of work done by each of them in return for the liberal salary of $2,250 per annum they each receive.

We certainly beat all other nations in every sort of human undertaking, and the ingenious audacity of a free people is fearfully and wonderfully exhibited in the way the bank safes are broken into. It is the romance of burglary, the like of which we never read of in English, French or German journals. We have an idea that, in future, the best security of bank valuables would be somewhere outside the safe—in a box on the mantel-piece or with the waste papers in the sah-barrel. Certainly if the use of safes is to continue, it will be necessary to have watchmen for them, who will not sleep in the garret, but in the office, and on the very spot through which burglars would be expected to come up from the lower floor.

General PRIM, in reply to Señor ORENSE, says there will be no more coups d'état in Spain' and all concerned may take his word for it. Spain will move like Italy. The revolutionary changes in the latter have produced no counteraction in those principalities that have undergone them. When the tempters draw near that Italian border, to raise a breeze and have RIENZI'S "good estate" again, they are seen to vanish presently, like mountain mist, "with a word speaking." Spain has hitherto worked under a discreet compulsion, and will be likely to do so to the end. The genius of CARLYLE'S "constable" seems to have a large predominance in all these Peninsular affairs.

The late disturbances in Paris seem to have been a good deal "stimulated" and wanting in the terrible spontaneity of the older emeutes. It now appears that the agitators were, at least in some cases, bribed with five franc pieces to "sail in." Many declared that the Emperor made more of the affair than it merited, which is very likely. At any rate, he did not seem to be very much afraid of it.

As regards those sales of real estate at Rahway, we think the people who attend them should have a conscience, and not run "like half-starved lunatics for the lunch," if they do not intend to buy land. Very likely, indeed, some of them have no money to buy; and the voracity would go to prove this; for, as a general rule, people who have little or no money have the fiercest appetites. Still, the lunch-providers need not be too hard on them. Those hungry customers show, in a manner not to be mistaken, that the air and climate of Jersey have given them mighty appetites; and this leads to the conclusion that it must be a healthful and desirable region for foreign settlement.

A Washington correspondent of the Alta California reports that in a conversation about the capital of the Pacific State, General SHERMAN told how a man named SEMPLE went to the Vallejo Ranch, near Yerba Buena, and agreed with him to name the city to be built on the shore of the bay after Señora Francisca Vallejo. We have an idea that there is some mistake here, for that place seems to have been called "San Francisco" long before the Americans from the East went into the country. There is some curious misunderstanding in SHERMAN'S mind about the naming of the Pacific metropolis.

Writers of thrilling stories for the journals and "Dime" series need be in no want of a hero. There is one ready to hand, furnished with every attribute needful. The name is Hildebrand, to begin with—one of the boldest and grimmest in romance; and any one objecting against Samuel, should remember the famous hill-champion of the Caucasus. HILDEBRAND stands six feet one; with hawk nose, florid or blood-colored spot on each cheek, black slouched hat, butternut coat, and walks erect with head thrown back after the manner of all reckless bushwhackers. Such is the Hue and Cry of Missouri. HILDEBRAND is making for the Mississippi with a reward of $10,000 for his head. It is a very exciting subject, for as an old poet says,

"It more stirs the blood
To rouse the lion than to start the hare."

There is a report that HILDEBRAND is dead. It may be so; but a proper desperado of that sort, who has killed eighty victims, is nearly as good dead as living—and better probably.

That checking of the French Cable only tends to give the public a greater assurance of its ultimate success, since it shows the great care and caution of those who have it in hand, and who chose rather to lose time and suffer temporary disparagement than to endanger the line in the tossing of a violent sea. They seem to keep their eyes warily on the end, and to be mindful of the serviceable old motto, Respice finem—or funem—if they should prefer that reading.

Our London correspondent, in his sketch of the notabilities figuring in that venerable and close-packed metropolis, says the tradesmen there are deploring the dullness of business and crying out against the Queen for not residing among them. They should remember their stout predecessors on that ground, who, when told by JAMES I. that he could make some other city the Court capital, hoped His Majesty would at least leave them the River Thames! Royalty is no great staff to lean upon nowadays even in England, and the Prince of WALES is not helping to restore its prestige—if all our correspondent says be true.

The new Cattle Market at Weehawken is a very great improvement, as regards the condition of the animals, and consequently that of the meat in the market. But here another consideration comes in, and people in general will ask, Why should not the beasts be slaughtered over there? Such an arrangement would spare our up-town citizens a good deal of inconvenience and the butchers' business could be done in a more cleanly and satisfactory manner, in a place which is so much out of the way and yet so very near the City markets.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Drama at Home.

Theatrical affairs in the City are not at all a fruitful theme of comment. The bills at most of the theatres are unchanged, and the prosperity of each and all is by no means brilliant. Speculations as to the incidents of the coming season are the only topics of comment for the present. Nothing whatever is known, it seems, as to the prospects of a Fall season at Wallack's. Booth's will be tenanted first by Mr. JEFFERSON, and then by Miss BATEMAN. The Grand Opera House will be reopened, possibly under the management of Mr. F. C. BANGS; the nature of the attraction, however, cannot be referred to, as yet, with any degree of certainty. The Fifth-avenue Theatre, henceforward under the management of Mr. DALY, will perhaps be brightened with the presence of Mrs. SCOTT-SIDDONS, whom Mr. DALY, we are told, seeks to engage, with a view to producing "Twelfth Night." At Niblo's, "Arrah Na Pogue" with Mr. DOMINICK MURRAY will succeed "Sinbad" early in August; Miss ROSE EYTINGE will probably play Arrah Meelish. At the Olympic, in September, a piece first given a quarter of a century ago, will be enacted by Messrs. J. K. MORTIMER, ASA CUSHMAN, assisted by a regular company. Mr. COLVILLE sailed for Europe yesterday to seek plays and actors for Wood's Museum. The minor legitimate drama will have a permanent abode, we understand, at the Theatre Comique. The Waverley may have for its occupants Mr. DAN BRYANT and his swarthy associates. These announcements are pretty authoritative, and are too significant as to the character of the Autumn season to need comment. Their summary is all that can be offered in the shape of local intelligence of interest.

EXPERIENCE OF A LION TAMER.

The Charleston News prints an account of the experience of Herr LENGEL, the lion tamer, furnished a representative of that journal by Herr LENGEL himself. This is quite interesting, and is therefore worth reproduction. "We found Mr. LENGEL," says the narrator, "lying down reading, not suffering much, but very restless. He is apparently about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age, but is really ten years older. He told us that he is a native of Philadelphia, and has been engaged in the lion-taming business for eighteen years, during which time he has served in the circusses of J. M. JUNE, S. B. HOWE, PHINEAS T. BARNUM, HAIGHT & CHAMBERS, VAN AMBURGH, RAYMOND & CO., CASTELLO and AMES, the latter of which he is with at present. JUNE is dead, HOWE and BARNUM have quit the business, HAIGHT & CHAMBERS failed in Texas two years ago. HAIGHT and CASTELLO are now 'showing' in California. In answer to a question as to his manner of taming lions, he replied at length, saying that 'it was a gift of nature' with him. I have no fear of them. People tell me every time I get a wound that it ought to be a warning to me, and should make me fear to go in the cage again. But it does not. When I am away from the lions I get homesick, and when I can go where they are and my wounds prevent me from going into the cage, I get more homesick still. I never met any lions I could not tame. Three years ago, I tamed five in New York, which, while in Europe had killed one man and badly mangled another, who attempted to tame them. In three weeks after they were put in my cage, they were as tame as I wished, though they were before considered untamable. I very seldom use force in taming them, but sometimes it becomes necessary—kindness is my usual plan; I am always careful to keep my eye upon them. Every one who has seen 'the lion tamer' leaving the cage after his feat of laying down among the lions, putting his feet on their heads, feeding them and firing off pistols, has doubtless noticed how careful he was—stepping out backwards very deliberately, and watching closely the beasts which always advanced upon him. In speaking of this, he said: If I did not keep my eye upon them they would jump at me. They have sense enough to know that I am retreating from them, and they gain courage; there is more danger to me at this time than at any other. If the lions were at liberty, I would fear to go near them. Some people think that a lion born in America is more docile, partaking less of the savage nature of the brute, than one born in Africa or Asia. Not so. I would rather have a lion or lioness born in either of the last two mentioned places than a litter born in this country—the latter are more dangerous and less easily tamed. Mr. LENGEL has been bitten a number of times by lions, lionesses we should have said, as the males have never done so, the lioness, said he, 'are more treacherous and deceitful than the lions.' He has been slightly scratched an almost innumerable number of times. He has never had to lay up but twice from his wounds. The description of the wounds and the places where he received them are mentioned below. The first wound was a bite in the left leg, in Western Pennsylvania, while with Barnum's Circus. The second was received while with S. B. HOWE & Co., in Augusta, Ga., being severely bitten in the left hand. The wound caused him to lose the use of his middle finger. The third was inflicted at Little Rock, Ark., by a lioness in Howe & Castello's Circus. This time two fingers of the right hand were mangled. He has full use of them now. The fourth was received in Madison, Ind., last Summer. The lioness seized him by the right leg, driving her teeth into the calf of his leg until they nearly met. The fifth was received last April in New-Orleans. The animal seized him by the left leg, inserting one tooth of the lower jaw an inch and a half into the calf, and a tooth of the upper jaw the same depth into the upper side of the knee joint. Mr. LENGEL was confined to his bed awhile, but when the circus moved he came along, and gave two exhibitions, one in Augusta and one in Savannah, the latter of which, he says, is a paradise for a circus. On coming here he made arrangements to perform last Wednesday, but his leg paining him, consulted Dr. F. M. ROBERTSON, who ordered him to bed at once, telling him that the bone of the leg was injured. This order was obeyed, and Mr. LENGEL still remains in bed. He is able, however, to travel about the room occasionally. It is somewhat of a coincidence that Dr. ROBERTSON has attended his patient on two other occasions at the Pavilion Hotel for wounds received from lionesses—all of the wounds being upon the left side of the body. Herr LENGEL does not think he was bitten but once intentionally. He says the lionesses when together never meet, but they snarl and snap at each other—two of them never live peaceably in the same cage—and states that it is his opinion that, with the exception mentioned, when he aggravated one beyond endurance, he was in the way, and was bitten for one of the lionesses. He has the teeth and claws of the lioness which he thinks bit him purposely. The teeth are an inch and a half long, with a root about two and a half inches in length. If the teeth were driven in flesh up to the gums, a large-sized peach stone could be planted in the hole. The claws, which the animal, like the cat, keeps unexposed till wanted, are formidable looking objects. We do not now doubt, as we once did the assertions of travelers, that one blow from a lion's paw would kill a man or tear out great masses of flesh. Herr LENGEL says he fears their claws more than their teeth—that they generally strike before they bite. Herr LENGEL will have to remain here about ten days longer, after which it is probable he will be able to rejoin his company."

The Drama Abroad.

Mr. TOM TAYLOR's new play, to the intended production of which at the Haymarket Theatre, frequent reference has been made, was first enacted on the night of June 21. "Miss BATEMAN," says the Morning Herald of the morrow, "made her rentrée last evening to a most brilliant and crowded house in a new domestic drama written expressly for her by TOM TAYLOR, Esq., and entitled 'Mary Warner.' Miss BATEMAN possesses in a most eminent degree the power to command the sympathies of her audience, and when it was announced that such a skillful author had drawn for her a character expressly suited to her peculiar powers, it rendered the production of the new play a matter of more than usual interest. The story is as follows: George Warner (Mr. HOWE) is a young and gifted artisan who, finding little scope for his talents in the mother country, determines to leave England with his wife Mary (Miss BATEMAN) to seek in a new country the advancement of his fortunes. With this view both husband and wife determine, without naming their resolution to each other, to ask of George's employers the advance of a small sum to help them on their voyage. The day they individually select for this application has witnessed the discharge of a fast young workman, Bob Levitt, (Mr. KENDAL,) who, loitering about the premises, hears first the husband and afterward the wife make the same request and receive the same refusal. When Mary has gone, Levitt discovers that the cash-box has been left open, and takes advantage of the opportunity to secure its contents and make good his retreat. Directly Messrs. Dutton & Downes discover their loss their suspicion falls upon Mary and George, they being the only persons known to have been left alone in the office. Meantime the thief, with a grotesque idea of liberality, determines to give Warner the money for his voyage, and reaching the house of the latter while Mary is still absent, he leaves the sum they had asked for, and also conceals the empty cash-box in the room. Mary returns home accompanied by a flighty young friend, Milly Rigg, (Miss CAROLINE HILL,) who has a penchant for Bob Levitt. They are startled by the appearance of Warner's employers, accompanied by a policeman, and almost at the same instant George reaches his home. He is soon made aware of the charge against him, and while fiercely protesting his innocence, the packet of notes and the broken cash-box are discovered. Overwhelmed with astonishment and maddened by rage, he is about to resist the officers, when Mary, bewildered by the evidence against him, and believing George must have yielded to temptation, yet willing at any sacrifice to save him from disgrace, accuses herself as the culprit. As the evidence appears to point conclusively to one or the other, George is reluctantly obliged to believe in her guilt, the act closing upon the desolated home and heart-broken husband, who beholds the wife he was so fond of in custody as a thief. Six months are supposed to elapse, and Mary has been convicted and committed to jail. George, crushed by shame at the thought of her crime, has never yet been to see her, but at the instigation of Milly Rigg at length consents to do so. The interview between them is made the cause of an irreconcilable breach between husband and wife by their mutual misunderstanding. All the reasons brought forward by Mary as evidence why she assumed the guilt which was never hers are construed by George into a confession of the crime, while his unspoken but easily-understood coldness and contempt for her fallen condition seem to the poor wife a most bitter return for her sacrifice. Wrought to frenzy by his reproaches she bids him an eternal farewell, resolving that when her term of imprisonment shall have expired she will never see him more. Mary is supposed to serve the term of her conviction, and we next find her in the apartment of Milly Rigg, now Mrs. Levitt. Mary hears the sad story of Bob's improvidence, which has brought his hapless wife and child to starvation, while Milly's sympathy is also required for Mary's wrongs in suffering the penalty for a crime she now avows she did not commit. Mary gives her her wedding-ring to pawn for necessaries for the fever-stricken infant, and wraps her own shawl around another as she hastens away. Milly almost immediately returns, bringing with her a purse, which she represents has been given her by a gentleman. Then leaving Mary's shawl behind her, again goes out on her purchases. Some policemen enter and accuse Mary of stealing the purse, and, disregarding her protestations of innocence, hurry her off to the Police Court, where she recognizes in her accuser the husband she has not seen for six long years. He will not swear to her identity as the woman who robbed him when he recognizes his wife, and she is, therefore, discharged, and hurries away before her husband can intercept her. Meanwhile Bob has resolved to tell Warner the whole truth—the remorse he has long felt at letting Mary bear the burden of his crime having culminated when he watched her nursing his dying child, and then saw her arrested for his wife's theft. He, therefore, goes to the man he has so much injured, and arranges with Milly a scheme to bring Mary with them to her husband's home. When Mary accompanies them hither Milly makes a pretext for leaving her alone, and soon a little girl—in fact, the one Mary had left an infant in her cradle—comes running in, and in the course of her childish prattle informs Mary that this is her birthday, and that her name is Mary Warner. The poor mother, torn by conflicting passions, yearning for her child, yet loathing the husband who had left her to suffer for his guilt, is about to rush away, when George enters, accompanied by Bob and Milly, explains that he has learnt from them all that she has innocently suffered for his sake, and the curtain falls on a happy reunion of the family. All the characters in the play have been well and carefully drawn; the situations artistically wrought and cleverly conceived; the interest of the whole being centred, not so much in the one character as in the development of the story. Among Mr. TOM TAYLOR's many successes that of "Mary Warner" will probably stand high upon the list. Miss BATEMAN's assumption of the part of Mary must be regarded as a complete artistic triumph. The "forms and shows of grief" were not heard in the broken accents with which Miss BATEMAN welcomed her husband to the prison, or poured out all the unutterable tenderness of a mother's heart over her unconscious child, and this very semblance of nature made them all the more touching. In some of the more pathetic portions Miss BATEMAN so acted upon the emotions of her audience that pocket-handkerchiefs were in demand. Miss BATEMAN was greeted most rapturously upon her appearance and during the performance, the delight of the audience sometimes approaching enthusiasm, and frequent calls before the curtain following as a matter of course. The other characters in the drama were admirably sustained. Mr. HOWE gave an artistic and natural interpretation of George Warner, while Mr. KENDAL showed some knowledge of effect as Bob Levitt, Mr. COMPTON appearing in a small part in his usual happy manner. Miss CAROLINE HILL had a good part in Milly Rigg, and did not fail to make the most of it. Other characters were sustained by the company of this theatre in their usual complete and effective manner. Miss BATEMAN received some "floral" compliments at the close, and Mr. TOM TAYLOR, in answer to a loud call, appeared to bow his acknowledgments. The success of the new play was undeniable, and it is a pity that Miss BATEMAN's engagement should be of such limited duration prior to her departure to transatlantic shores.

MISCELLANEOUS GOSSIP.

Miss NILSSON has appeared in England as Ophelia in "Hamlet," by AMBROISE THOMAS. The enthusiasm was great, la diva being thrice recalled at the close of the representation. Mr. SANTLEY was Hamlet.

The new Charing Cross Theatre has been opened to the public. The piece de resistance on the first night was a drama by Mr. C. S. CHELTNAM, called "Edendale." The story is laid in the time of the American civil war. The rival hosts do not, however, cross the boards, although in the course of one of the scenes an affair of outposts is supposed to take place in the near neighborhood of the footlights if not immediately in front of them. The play is neatly contrived and written, says the Pall Mall Gazette, and its success was unquestionable.

Mr. JOHN PARRY has positively retired from the stage, and a benefit performance was being organized by which he was to profit.

About a fortnight ago was held the Summer Fair at Bradford, in England. Among the exhibitions on the Fair ground was Whittington's Menagerie, consisting of a large collection of wild beasts, which included a Barbary lioness and a good-sized male puma. At intervals, these animals were put through a performance by one of the keepers named JOSEPH PEARCE. While the latter was in the cage with the animals on Friday evening, the lioness suddenly seized him by the arm, threw him down on the floor of the cage, and held him by the throat in its grip. The spectators became greatly alarmed, and while some, in the hope of rendering assistance, began to tear out the boards near the cages, others began to retreat by the passages. In a moment of the greatest apprehension, the puma fortunately struck the lioness a blow with its paw, and, thus diverted from the keeper, the brute turned savagely upon the puma, and the pair engaged in a fierce fight. The keeper, apparently little injured, immediately regained his control over the beasts, and persisted in finishing the performance.

At the Paris Ambigu, "Les Quatre Henri," a sensational drama of mediocre merit had been enacted. At the Theatre de Cluny, "Le Grief Polonais," by MM. ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN, had been produced with great success.

ALBERT GRISAR is dead. He was author of "Bonsoir, Monsieur Pantalon," a charming opera, and of about fourteen well-known works, all remarkable for originality of thought and delicacy of treatment. M. GRISAR was aged 61 years.

ALPHONSE KARR used to say that the best profession going was literature, provided a popular author carried on some other trade. French actors and actresses have accepted this dictum. Their theatrical earnings are the smallest part of the incomes of many of them. The farcial LEVASSEUR is a bookseller; VOLLETT deals in ladies' underclothing, and sells cuffs and collars to WORTH's customers; LACROIX is a jeweler; COULOMBIER is at the head of a soup kitchen; LEMAIRE is a dramatic publisher; LASSOUCHE is a dealer in bric-à-brac; and BERTHELIER's stays have a higher reputation than the famous corsets of Mme. VERTU. SARAH FELIX has no end of commercial irons in the fire, but her largest revenues are derived from an oyster park and some ponds where salmon are produced on the Coste principle. CARMOUCHE speculated in a boarding-house at Pierrefonds, and the capital on which he carried on his business was furnished by his wife, JENNY VERTPRE.

The gymnast, BIERMANN, was performing at Berlin a few days ago, with his pupil, KOLBE, a lad of 16, on the tight rope, at a great height from the ground. Suddenly the cord broke under their united weight, and they fell to the ground. The younger was killed on the spot, and the other so much injured that he died the next day.

SHERIDAN'S "School for Scandal" has been newly translated into German, and better than ever before. It is having a great run at Munich, and is likely to be performed at all the German theatres.

The portrait of HANDEL, presented by the illustrious composer to his relatives at Halle, on the occasion of his last visit in 1750, has just been bought by some Hamburg dilettanti for 400 thalers (£60.) A town subscription is proposed, with a view to its being purchased for the communal library, which already possesses 129 volumes of the master's manuscript scores.

WASHINGTON.

The Proposed Removals in the War Department—Secretary Rawlins' Intentions—Mrs. Dr. Walker Successful at Last—Miscellaneous.

Special Dispatches to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, July 3.

Secretary RAWLINS does not intend to make any removals from his Department without giving those whom it is proposed to dismiss an opportunity to show their claims on the Government, and to give reasons why, in their own opinion, they should be retained in service. In all cases where a clerk is singled out for dismissal the Secretary causes a note to be addressed to him, informing him of the fact and asking him to assign reasons why sentence should not be pronounced.

RESIGNATION OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. WALSH of Philadelphia, Chairman, and Mr. CAMPBELL of St. Louis, members of the Indian Peace Commission, have resigned their positions. Mr. WALSH could not have his own way.

THE FOURTH AND FIFTH.

President GRANT will remain in the City on the 4th and 5th; Secretary RAWLINS intends to visit his home in Connecticut; and Postmaster-General CRESWELL will spend his time in Maryland.

A POSITION FOR MRS. DR. WALKER.

Mrs. Dr. WALKER's persistency in the office-seeking line will probably be rewarded by a position in the Treasury Department. It is understood that the Third Auditor consented to give her a place some days ago, but that Secretary BOUTWELL has not yet approved the appointment.

THE WEATHER.

THE GRANT-BORIE CORRESPONDENCE.

The following is a copy of the letter of President GRANT accepting the resignation of Ex-Secretary BORIE:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 25, 1869.

Hon. A. E. Borie, Secretary of the Navy:

DEAR SIR: Your letter of this day tendering your resignation of the position of Secretary of the Navy is received. I need not assure you how much I regret the severance of our official connection, nor how confident I am that the high esteem I have always felt for you is increased with further acquaintance will continue while acquaintance lasts. I accept your resignation with regret, therefore, and I hope that the quiet you will find in retirement may restore you to perfect health.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT.

The above is a correct copy of the President's letter accepting Mr. BORIE'S resignation, taken from another copy of the same sent by Mr. BORIE to the Executive Mansion for the purpose of completing the files. The letter was written while Mr. BORIE was in the President's room, and taken away before a copy was made. But for this reason the Press would have been furnished with a copy before.

THE REPORTED CABINET CHANGES.

There is authority for stating that no Cabinet changes are contemplated, and that all which has been recently said on that subject in various newspapers is merely speculation.

NEW INDIAN SUPERINTENDENT.

DECISION ON THE TOBACCO TAX.

Deputy Commissioner DOUGLASS confirms the action of certain Revenue officers who are requiring auctioneers to pay the special tax on their sales of leaf tobacco, and also the tax of 8c per $1,000 on sales in excess of $10,000 annually. He decides that the payment of another special tax as commission merchant, manufacturer, auctioneer, &c., does not relieve them from the liability to pay this special tax if the merchant, manufacturer or auctioneer sells leaf tobacco. He says a uniform practice in this respect will be required in all parts of the country.

Five Human Bodies Found Packed in Barrels in the River at Louisville.

From the Louisville Express, July 1.

A great furore was created throughout the city, last evening, by the announcement being made by a negro, that five barrels containing five human bodies, had been found in the river four miles above the city. Coroner MOORE received information of the horrible discovery early last night. Collecting a party of gentlemen, with which to form a jury, he proceeded to the place where the discovery had been made, and after examining the contents of the barrels, which had been dragged on shore, sure enough the human bodies were found. Some of them had their feet cut off, some were minus arms, hands, &c.; others had no heads, and all of the five bodies were more or less mutilated. A brief investigation divulged the fact, beyond any dispute, that the remains had been subjects for the dissecting table of some one of our medical colleges. A negro was seen to throw an express wagon to the same spot early yesterday morning and unload the barrels containing the bodies into the river, but from which college the remains came is not known.

MARSHAL BARLOW.

The Action in the Union Republican General Committee.

From the Albany Journal, July 2.

As might have been expected from its previous denunciations of that officer, the Union Republican General Committee of New-York has adopted resolutions requesting President GRANT to remove Marshal BARLOW from his office—the ground alleged against him being that he does not appoint Republicans as his subordinates.

In its length and breadth, this charge is absolutely false, and those who make it know the fact. There is no more true and faithful Republican than General BARLOW. At the same time, it would not be easy to find a man more free from affiliation with cliques and factions, or who depises them more heartily. The real nature of his offence is this: A deputation from the General Committee waited upon him, and impudently demanded the appointment of a list of place-men and hangers-on, whom they had chosen. He politely told these gentlemen that he did not require their assistance in the management of his affairs. They then insisted that he should make all his appointments from New-York City. To this, he responded that he did not consider the Marshalship a local office, and should feel at liberty to take his subordinates from any point, provided they were faithful and competent. And that was all.

Marshal BARLOW is a splendid officer. His praises are in the mouths of all honest citizens. He has introduced into his office more system and efficiency than it has known in many years. It would be a singular and mortifying spectacle if this faithful public servant, intent only upon the right performance of his duties, should be removed because he will not consent to establish a hospital for partisan hacks and curbstone politicians, and make his position a source of power and pelf to an arrogant clique. The adoption of a resolution making this request is a gross insult to the President, and he will probably treat the petition with the contempt it deserves.

The so-called Republican General Committee is in no sense fairly representative of the Republican Party in the metropolis. Under the control of men like CHARLEY SPENCER, JOHN V. GRIDLEY, and other shrewd and selfish demagogues of like character, it has degenerated into a mere factious machine, which is run for their benefit, and to keep them prominently before the public. The doors are closed against all who will not submit to the dictation of these men, and degrade political action by making it merely subservient to the feathering of their nests. As a consequence, thousands of the most intelligent Republicans of the metropolis, who stand squarely upon the Chicago platform, are denied representation on the Committee, or participation in primaries, ward committees, and convention delegateships. The number of those thus "tabooed" by the fiat of CHARLEY SPENCER is very generally underestimated. In 1867 we polled a little over 36,000 votes in New-York City—and we should not have had even this small number but for the aid of men in whom the "close corporation" decline to recognize party fidelity. Last year our best men, on all sides, made a vigorous attempt to secure harmony, which was successful in temporarily defeating the bigotry of the "ring" and achieving a very general union upon GRANT and GRISWOLD. The result was a total of more than 47,000 Republican votes—a gain of 21,000 in a single year. But the KINGSLEYS and GRIDLEYS are again at the front, and the old policy of proscription is enforced anew with unabated vigor. Figures such as we have quoted show that the Republicans of the City, State at large have a right to demand. They have been called annually to the up-hill work of carrying elections, despite these shameful dissensions, and succeeded in doing so until overborne by the tremendous wave of Democratic corruption and villany that fell upon the metropolis in this city, which with habitual and amusing arrogance it regards chiefly as a branch of its business—printed an article containing friendly and appreciative mention of us. This might have astonished us more had its object been less patent. The Herald has since fully offset this fleeting generosity by frequent ill-natured flings. Another and a more consistent and honorable journal, the TIMES, has lately given much attention to our concerns, and with an affectation of generous sympathy, and under the pretence of kindly counsel, has done what it could to prejudice us in the judgment of outsiders. Unlimited street-railroads, thorough-fares, and dangerous suburbs no longer arouse the anxiety of our contemporaries on the other side of the river. Just now it is our financial situation that troubles them. The TIMES yesterday returned to the subject of taxation, and drew an exceedingly gloomy picture of the actual present and probable future. It proved, to its own satisfaction, that we are rapidly drifting to bankruptcy. It anticipated the early withdrawal of "all personal and incorporated wealth." It declared that no bank or insurance company would remain here, but that all such monied institutions must speedily close their doors and begin business somewhere else. It relentlessly depopulated Brooklyn of all its citizens, except the comparatively small number that cannot get away, and left the town a wilderness of "non-resident lands." The reader of the TIMES, accepting its predictions with unquestioning faith, might expect this morning to see moving toward the ferries long lines of trucks loaded with the household goods of alarmed residents, fleeing as from a city of pecuniary destruction. As nothing of the kind can be seen, as the procession of furniture trucks moves not to but from the ferries, in yearly increasing force, the vaticinations of the TIMES must be received with doubt approaching absolute suspicion. Our prophet of evil finds no help for us in our own devices. It regards the increased valuation of the Assessors as "a mere subterfuge," and pronounces the policy "remarkable" and "pernicious"—ignoring what is obvious enough, that the relatively high rate of taxation here is to be attributed in a large measure to the inadequate aggregate estimate of property. It calls the new valuation "fictitious," overlooking the fact that the fiction lay in the old and absurdly insufficient assessment. But the TIMES has its own plan for our relief. "Was ever," it asks, "substance more completely sacrificed to shadow?" And then it invites us to sacrifice our substance, not to a shadow, but to a very positive and dreadful reality. It gravely proposes that we shall abandon our "separate corporate existence," relinquish our municipal independence, and consent to annexation to the great Metropolis." The remedy is far worse than the disease, even were the disease as threatening as the TIMES would have us believe. Annexation, instead of the end, would be the beginning of troubles. What sort of an entertainment is this to which we are invited? We waive all sentimental considerations and put out of sight the conventionally "moral" aspects of the case. We shall not refer to the flagrant viciousness, as disclosed in police returns, of the Metropolis that wooes us to its embrace; or to the degraded condition of its lower strata of population, its centres of festering corruption, its established nuisances, its crowded tenement-houses and underground life; or to many other shames and shams of which we should share the disgrace were the proposed union perfected. It is not necessary to go so far in the consideration of the question. The public and municipal consequences of the suggested alliance assure its rejection. We cannot tell what may be in store for us as the result of a bad political example, but thus far the local Government of Brooklyn is of clarified purity compared with that of New-York. Shall we accept the rule of the Metropolitan Ring, with its Tweed and SWEENY manage the legislative machine, shall a frisky FISK run our Judiciary as he would run a railroad or an opera bouffe company, boasting that he carries in his pocket the blank decrees of our Courts, with the privilege of filling them at his discretion? New-York, which has long overshadowed, no doubt would rejoice to absorb us, but Brooklyn is not quite ready to be absorbed. The TIMES does not show in detail how annexation is to be financially profitable to us. It does not say whether New-York will assume our debt and therefore pay our taxes as well as its own. But the omission is unimportant; the negotiations will not reach that point. Nothing less than actual bankruptcy, of which the TIMES parades a bugbear, a sale of our city at auction, and its purchase by the Ring at a nominal price, can accomplish the union proposed as a violent remedy for an exaggerated disease.

THREE POLITICAL LETTERS.

Alexander H. Stephens, Lewis D. Campbell and Samuel Cary.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia, has written a letter touching the question of the eligibility of the negro members of the State Legislature, and the weight to which the late decision of the Supreme Court of the State is entitled with the General Assembly. He says that he believes the decision of the Court, affirming the eligibility of negroes to office in Georgia, to be in accordance with the law and Constitution, and he doubts not that, had he been on the bench, he should have come to the same conclusion, though not exactly by the same process of reasoning. He says, moreover, that he thought the two Houses committed an error in deciding that the negro members there were qualified to hold office; but it was a question which they alone had the right and power under the Constitution to decide; and the decision having been made by them, it cannot be again opened or reversed by any court, nor even by themselves. Mr. STEPHENS thinks, however, that in the future, when doubtful questions are brought before the General Assembly, or where the convictions of the members are not both clear and strong, they should be influenced by this decision of the Court.

Hon. LEWIS D. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, has written a letter to a friend, replying very fully to questions propounded by him on the political topics of the day. He says that he maintains unchanged and uncompromising in his opposition to any extension of the right of suffrage, believing that if any change is to be made, it would be better to curtail it than to extend it. As for negro suffrage, it was, he says, upon that vital point that he severed his connection with the Republican Party; and if he should now be found important to extend the voting privilege in Ohio, he would much prefer giving it to the women than to the negroes. He is "especially opposed to the fraudulent means through which the Republican Party are persistently endeavoring to fasten upon the general negro suffrage." And he condemns the alarming aggressions which the party calling itself Republican has made upon the principles which constitute a Republican Government. The currency he regards as certainly in a bad condition; he would not have the Government repudiate any of its bonds, "but pay all according to contract," he never having entertained a doubt of the propriety or justice of paying off the bonds in greenbacks where the contract does not expressly provide for the payment in coin. In conclusion he says that although originally a protectionist, observation and experience have greatly modified his views on this subject, and he is not prepared to say that he would even now oppose the throwing open of our ports of entry to all the nations of the earth who would open theirs to us.

General SAMUEL F. CARY, of Ohio, has written a letter, in which he says that he opposed the Fifteenth Amendment when in Congress, and that he knows no good reason why other States and the Federal Government should compel the people of Ohio to accept negro suffrage in the election of State and municipal as well as Federal officers. He condemns the course pursued by the dominant party to secure the adoption of this amendment in the North and South, and expresses the opinion that Congress has no more right to shut out representatives from Texas until she ratifies it, than it has to turn out Ohio representatives because her Legislature rejected it. Respecting the payment of the public debt, he has not changed his mind; "where the law provides for coin payment of bonds they should be so paid." The national bank notes should be withdrawn, and the bonds now redeemable should be paid in legal money. "The demand for gold," he says, "is insolent and unjust, and the passage of the Gold bill by Congress, if it had the force of law, would justify the entire repudiation of the public debt, if it is not itself the first step toward repudiation." He declares his belief in the principles of free trade, and in conclusion says that the people have occasion to be alarmed at the rapid progress we are making toward a centralized, consolidated despotism.

THE CHINESE IN AMERICA.

Interview Between the Committee of Ways and Means and Prominent Chinese Merchants of San Francisco.

In San Francisco, June 25, Senators WADE and CONKLING and the House Committee of Ways and Means met with the representatives of the six Chinese companies of the city and several of the leading merchants and bankers. There was an interchange of compliment and sentiment, and one of the Chinese representatives, FUNG TANG, delivered the following speech:

GENTLEMEN: It gives me, and all Chinese merchants of San Francisco, great pleasure to meet honorable Senators and Members of Congress of the United States. We are made very happy by seeing you here, for we can explain to you our wishes and the wants of our people. Our Government took pleasure in appointing an American Ambassador to make treaties with foreign Powers, and we are satisfied with your treaty with our nation, but want the just protection it promises. America is probably better known to the Chinese people than any other country, because many of our people have lived here, and written home faithful accounts of the country. China is a very old nation, but our people have learned many new things from the Americans. The population of China is very large, and intercourse between our countries will be very intimate, if we have just laws to protect us. You probably know that we have very rich merchants and bankers in China, but we cannot advise them to risk their capital here when their agent cannot testify in your Courts, for like your own capitalists they wish to know that their property is protected and secure to them before parting with it. Much gold and silver is hoarded in China which might be used profitably here, if the Chinese felt sure we had full and proper protection. We merchants have tried to be honest and fair in our dealings with your respectable merchants here, and have paid our debts to Americans as scrupulously as to our own people. The managers of some of your largest San Francisco firms, engaged in trade with China, who have trusted us for hundreds of thousands of dollars at a time, without security, are here to prove the truth of what I say. We have introduced your grain and other American produce into China, and labored to establish a trade, which, if properly encouraged, must prove of great value to this country. We hope you will pass a law doubling the Government pay to your line of China steamers, and oblige them to run each way twice a month; for we feel certain that the cost will be small, when compared to the benefits your country will receive. Captain ELDRIDGE will tell you how much of their freight and passage money is paid by our people now—and should you increase the number of trips, we will do all in our power to support this line, and thus insure its success.

At the banquet given in this city before the sailing of the first American steamship for China, I made a speech full of congratulations on the commencement of this great enterprise. All Chinese felt very happy, because we are willing to do what make our nations better acquainted, and we hoped you would, by knowing us, learn to like us, and be willing to protect us from some evils we now suffer, and which we think unjust. We think your special tax, collected only from Chinese miners, is not according to our treaty with your Government. We are willing to pay taxes cheerfully when taxed equally with others. We also think the tax of five dollars collected from each Chinaman for coming into this State is not right, if this is a free country. But most of all we feel the want of protection to life and property when Courts of justice refuse our testimony, and thus leave us defenceless and unable to obtain justice for ourselves, and often for others. The Chinese who come to California to labor are poor men, so our companies, which are formed to assist them, and not to oppress them, advance money to bring them here, but no slavery exists at all among our people, for every man receives wages for his labor and works voluntarily. Some people in California have said we had slaves here, but it is not true. We make men contribute from their earnings enough to pay their debts, if money has been advanced to bring them to this country. China can furnish you good, faithful, industrious men to cultivate rice and cotton in your Southern States if you wish to employ them; or to raise tea and silk in California, if you will make laws to protect and make them feel safe, and insure them equal justice with other nations, according to their treaty with your Government. As a people, we wish to do right and treat all people well. If you will converse with my countrymen here to-day, they will answer any questions you wish to ask, and we hope, on your return to Washington, you will speak favorably of us to the United States Government. For all Chinese in California and the Chinese merchants of San Francisco, we welcome you here, and thank you kindly for thinking of us and honoring us with a visit. We have received much kindness from many excellent people in California, all of which we appreciate, and for which we gratefully tender our thanks.

A LIVELY SNAKE STORY.

A Serpent in Ohio, Sixteen Feet Long, Gives Chase to Two Boys—They Finally Dispatch Him.

From the Columbus (Ohio) Statesman, July 2.

For some time past an immense black snake has been seen on the Chittenden farm, on the Westerville road, about two miles from the city, and by reason of his fearful proportions and defiant attitudes, has filled the neighborhood with alarm and terror. Not long since he was seen slowly traversing a field, with head erect, and bearing in his mouth a large rooster, which he had captured on a foraging expedition, and at another time an amateur sportsman, of this city, suddenly came upon him as he was in the act of crushing a cat in his tightening folds. The snake was of such great size, and manifested so much rage that the young man immediately ran away from the terrible locality, not once thinking of his gun, which he might have used most effectively in destroying the monster. The fact of seeing the snake was reported to a number of acquaintances on the arrival home of the frightened hunter, and the next day a number proceeded to the locality where he was seen the day before, but no trace of his snakeship could be found, and the hunter was jeered by his companions as the victim of a baseless imaginary fear. The following day two boys were walking in the same neighborhood, and came upon the snake, who, with erect head and darting tongue, at once gave chase. The boys ran furiously for nearly half a mile, closely followed by the reptile, before he slackened his speed and gave up the chase. This also was reported, and again an exploring party visited the ground, and searched carefully for the snake, but without success. On Tuesday morning of this week, the same two boys again visited the Chittenden farm, this time better prepared to encounter the foe should he put in an appearance. They had not been on the grounds a great while before they were gratified by an appearance of the monster, who was approaching them with evident warlike intent. The boys took position, and so soon as an opportunity presented, made such well-directed shots as to place their enemy entirely in their power, when they soon dispatched him. The monster measured sixteen feet in length, and was proportionately large. One of the most respectable citizens of the county, a gentleman well known in Columbus, saw and measured the snake, and assures us that there is no mistake in the above statement of his length. We understand that the brave slayers of the reptile are having his skin properly stuffed, and design exhibiting it.

Chase & Higginson	25,000	at	116 49
Total	$3,000,000

At the Stock Exchange the Public Funds ruled in correspondence with the above awards, and at the close of business they were partially higher on a scarcity of some of the 5-20s for cash delivery.

The descriptions of the United States 5-20s bought by the Secretary to-day are as follows:

1867	$2,621,000	1864	$40,000
1868	265,000	1862	74,000
Total			$3,000,000

The sales of Gold during the day advanced on Friday's last price from 136⅝ to 137@137⅛ ₱ cent., closing about 137 ₱ cent. Exchange on London dull at 109⅛@109¾ ₱ cent. The Treasury Office received during the week for Gold Customs $1,786,830, and paid out $7,213,816 for Gold Interest on the Public Debt. A larger amount of Gold Interest Checks have been issued for the July Interest than shown by the actual payments, which will come into the report of the following week. The payments are not so promptly called for as for the first three days for last July, by $2,700,000. The Banks gain on their Gold averages of the week $3,263,000—the average being a rising one. They lose $1,426,000 in Greenbacks by the withdrawals, in an irregular way, by certain Brokers trading for and upon the high rates of Money. To-day the Treasury paid out $2,837,000 on its extra purchases of United States 5-20s, and the Greenback average at Bank is probably a rising one. The liquidation of Loans on the present Bank Statement is $2,062,000; the decrease on the general line of Deposits, $1,345,000.

The Money market worked easier than on Thursday and Friday, and the rates to the Brokers over the holiday were 10 ₱ cent. per annum (7 in Gold) to ⅙ ₱ cent. for the three days.

On the Stock Exchange the Public Funds closed firm after the purchases of the day by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Railways were also generally firm, and several of the New-York and Western lines higher than on Friday. The State Bonds, except North Carolinas, new, steady. Pacific Mail advanced to 92 ₱ cent. The Brokers left the Street early to enjoy the holiday adjournment to Tuesday forenoon.

The following quotations were made at the close, as compared with Friday night:

The aggregate amount of imports (other than dry goods and specie) at the Port of New-York for the week ending July 2, 1869, was $3,679,682.

The Albany Argus says:

The quantity of Flour, Wheat, Corn and Barley left at tide-water during the fourth week in June, in the years 1868 and 1869, was as follows:

	Flour, bbls.	Wheat, bushels.	Corn, bushels.	Barley, bushels.
1868	8,500	172,000	626,800	....
1869	15,800	1,399,100	402,000	....
Increase	7,200	In. 1,227,100	Dec. 224,800	Dec. ....

The aggregate quantity of the same articles left at tide-water from the commencement of navigation to the 30th ult., inclusive, during the years 1868 and 1869, was as follows:

	Flour, bbls.	Wheat, bushels.	Corn, bushels.	Barley, bushels.
1868	90,800	4,339,000	4,919,000	326,400
1869	78,700	41,06,400	1,403,100	11,800
Decrease	11,900	232,600	3,515,900	314,600

By reducing the Wheat to Flour, the quantity of the latter left at tide-water this year, compared with the corresponding period last year, shows a decrease equal to 58,420 bbls. Flour.

The following comparative table shows the quantity of some of the principal articles of produce left at tide-water from the commencement of navigation to and including the 30th June in the years indicated:

	1867.	1868.	1869.

Internal Revenue Decision.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, June 24, 1869.

SIR: I reply to yours of the 9th inst., that the act of July 20, 1868, (section 59,) declares every person who sells, or offers for sale, distilled spirits, &c., shall be deemed a dealer in liquors, no reference being made as to the manner in which such sales shall be made. The amendatory act of April 10, 1869, does not change the definition of a liquor-dealer in this respect, and the Office is of opinion that under the terms of said acts auctioneers were and are liable to special tax as dealers in liquors, with respect to their sales of liquors by auction.

Respectfully,
J. W. DOUGLASS,
Deputy Commissioner.

JAS. ATKINS, Esq., Collector, Atlanta, Ga.

The Tombs—Hogan, Justice.

LARCENY OF NEWSPAPERS.

Wm. H. Kane, of No. 41 Park-row, caused the arrest of Patrick Curry yesterday, and accused him of having stolen $15 worth of newspapers. It appears that the prisoner was employed in the building, and offered the stolen property to Geo. Scott, of No. 49 Ann-street, for the purpose of sale. The magistrate committed Curry for trial at the Special Sessions.

A JUVENILE BURGLAR.

The apartments of Mrs. Annie Robinson, at No. 22 Mott-street, were forcibly entered on Friday night by the window, which was forced open with a jimmy. The burglar carried off $90 worth of wearing apparel. Acting on certain information received, Detective Dolan, of the Sixth Ward, arrested Joseph McNamara, aged 17, on suspicion of being the culprit. Soon after his arrest the prisoner admitted his guilt, and stated that he had pawned the property stolen. When brought before Justice Hogan, McNamara was fully committed to stand trial at the General Sessions, and was locked up in default of $1,000 bail.

DARING LARCENY OF MONEY.

Yesterday morning, about 11 o'clock, two men, who subsequently gave their names as David Williams and John Brown, sauntered in front of the store of Messrs. Bonhorst & Koch, at No. 349 Greenwich-street, when one of them engaged the attention of Mr. Bonhorst, under pretence of wishing to purchase some produce. In the meanwhile entered the store and succeeded in rifling the money drawer of a pocketbook containing $152 and $12 in loose change. No sooner had the larceny been committed than both of the men ran off, being pursued by Mr. Bonhorst, who succeeded, with the assistance of two citizens, in effecting their arrest. The missing money was found on the sidewalk, near the scene of the arrest. When arraigned before the Magistrate, the accused were fully committed for trial in default of bail. Lyons refused to sign his examination-paper, and was quite insolent in his demeanor.

The Attorney-General's Decision that the Military Code is not in Conflict with the State Constitution—Fines to be Collected on Pain of Imprisonment.

In General Order No. 12, current series, issued recently, from General Headquarters, State of New-York, Adjutant-General FRANKLIN TOWNSEND announces that the following opinion of Attorney-General M. B. CHAMPLAIN, in relation to the imposition of fines by Courts-martial and imprisonment of delinquents for their non-payment, has been received, and is published for the information of the members of the National Guard, who will guide themselves accordingly:

SIR:—The papers referred to me from your office have been examined.

From the papers presented, it appears the constitutionality of those provisions of the military code, which authorize the imposition of fines by Courts-martial and imprisonment of delinquents for their non-payment have been questioned.

It is suggested that the State laws establishing the summary jurisdiction of these Courts to try and punish delinquents without presentment of a grand jury or trial before a petit jury, are violations of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, contained in the several amendments of that instrument proposed at the first session of Congress after its adoption.

These amendments are not restrictions upon the powers of the States. They are restrictions upon the powers of the Government of the United States, intended to control the proceedings of the Federal Courts in the trial of offences for crimes committed against the Federal laws. Each State is at liberty, through the exercise of its legislative power, to prescribe for the punishment of all crimes and delinquencies on the part of its citizens, against the laws of the State, subject only to restrictions contained in its own Constitution.

The provisions of the military code for the imposition and collection of fines, and imprisonment of delinquents for their non-payment, are not in conflict with the State Constitution.

It is ordained by section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution that "the militia of this State shall at all times hereafter be armed and disciplined and ready for service."

From the provision contained in section 6 of article 1 of the Constitution, usually denominated the Bill of Rights, declaring that no person shall be held to answer for crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, there are expressly excepted cases arising in the militia which this State may keep, with the consent of Congress, in time of peace.

All the powers of legislation necessary to give full effect to the requirement that the militia shall at all times be armed and disciplined and ready for service, are conferred upon the Legislature.

If there be any department of the Government in which this authority is vitally essential, it is in the organization of our military force, on which we rest our ultimate dependence for the preservation of the public order, the enforcement of the laws and our common security, whether in peace or war.

The National Guard is organized and disciplined with the consent of Congress.

The further provisions in the bill of rights of the State Constitution, for trial by jury, in all cases in which it has heretofore been used, and declaring that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty and property without due process of law, are inapplicable to the police regulations and laws passed to give effect to the mandate of the Constitution that the militia shall be disciplined, armed and ready for service.

The exception of cases arising in the militia is contained in the same article in which these provisions are found, and in the same section in which is contained the injunction that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

A fine for a military delinquency is imposed and imprisonment for its non-payment is inflicted by due process of law by the judgment of a Court-martial, if the laws are constitutional which create the Court and confer upon it such jurisdiction.

I am of opinion, as before stated, these laws are constitutionally enacted. It has been held that when the Constitution speaks of a person not being held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, it means to answer in a case of criminal proceedings, to answer criminaliter with a view to punishment under the criminal law, and has no reference whatever to those collateral or incidental proceedings which are disciplinary in their character, or have exclusive regard to some special character or relation which belongs to the individual.

In the matter of Smith, 10 Wendell, page 449, the provision in the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the trial by jury, as we have seen, applies only to the Federal Courts; and our State Constitution secures the right in all cases in which it has heretofore been used.

It was never in use before or since the adoption of the Constitution, in cases like this.

Courts-martial were in use as a means of enforcing discipline in the militia, by summary punishment of delinquents, long before the adoption of the Constitution. The provision applies only to cases of trials of issues of fact in civil or criminal proceedings in the Courts of justice.

The general form of the warrant for the collection of fines, promulgated by General Orders No. 8, is sufficient and in compliance with the law. When such warrant recites the facts of the real accusation with certainty as to time and place, and the nature of the delinquency, within the law, such warrant is valid for the execution of the judgment of the Court-martial, when such Court is regularly and legally held.

Respectfully submitted,
M. B. CHAMPLAIN, Attorney-General.

SUSPICIOUS CASE OF DEATH.

Thomas Irwin Cornell Shoots Himself with a Revolver—Suspicious Proceedings by a Deputy Coroner.

THOMAS IRWIN CORNELL, aged 18, and a son of Mr. J. B. CORNELL, the extensive iron manufacturer, shot himself through the head with a revolver on Friday morning, death ensuing in a few minutes after the occurrence. It appears that the deceased came to the store, where he was employed as clerk, at the usual hour in the morning, and at about 10 o'clock went into the back office on the first floor, in the rear. Soon afterward his brother and another clerk, who were sitting in the front part of the store, heard the report of a pistol, and going into the rear office they found young CORNELL lying on a lounge insensible, with a revolver by his side. On examination it was found that the ball had entered the right side of the forehead near the temple, penetrating the brain and producing a fatal wound. The unfortunate youth remained unconscious from the time he was discovered and died in three-quarters of an hour. He had purchased the pistol a few days before, and had frequently had it out showing it to his friends. It is supposed by his friends that while lying on the lounge examining the weapon he accidentally discharged it. The bullet had passed upward and into the brain, causing death in less than an hour after the occurrence. As the deceased died in an unconscious condition, no positive statement could be gained regarding the manner in which the fatal wound was inflicted. The possibility of its being a case of suicide is precluded from the minds of his relatives and those who knew him intimately, by the fact that he was a young man of unusually buoyant spirits and lively and jovial disposition, characteristics which he had displayed only a few minutes before the occurrence. There was nothing, so far as known, in his health, condition, circumstances or associations that would lead him to think of suicide, and therefore his friends feel assured that his death was accidental.

Coroner KEENAN was notified by the relatives in PROSPECT PARK.

The Races of the Last Day of the Meeting.

The Hurdle Race Won by "Mitchell"—"General Yorke," "Pompey Payne," "Stamps" and "M. A. Sanford" the Winners of the Other Races.

Yesterday was the third and concluding day of the Prospect Park Fair Grounds Association race meeting, given under the auspices and management of the American Jockey Club. The previous two days of the meeting had been very unfavorable as to the weather, but the final day was signalized by bright, warm sunshine, with a delightful sea breeze from the adjacent Bay of New-York, which rendered the temperature pleasant and enjoyable. The attendance was large, select and fashionable, and every one present appeared to enjoy the splendid racing of the afternoon.

There were five races on the day's programme, and the result of one of them, that between the two-year-olds, in a dead heat, produced the finest and fastest race ever witnessed on the American turf between horses of that age. The result of the opening contest, the hurdle race, was a heavy blow and serious discouragement to the backers of the favorite, the Western mare Lobelia, who last year swept everything before her in races of this description. Having only one opponent, Mr. JAMES TURNER'S three-year-old colt Mitchell, it was thought a certainty for Lobelia; her stable being equally as confident as the betting men that she would win, and backing her freely at the current odds of $100 to $30. Harry Booth and Bohannon were also entered in the race, but Mr. TODD, the owner of the former, feeling dissatisfied with the weight placed by the handicapper on his horse, (160 pounds,) would not allow him to start. Bohannon had gone home on the morning of the race, hence the field was reduced to Lobelia and Mitchell. Lobelia was ridden by PRIOR, her bona fide owner, who only escaped being ruled off the Saratoga Course for "throwing" a hurdle race with her on the 19th day, and two days afterward winning with her from the June field of horses, by making a fictitious sale of the mare. Allowed on sufferance to ride here, when the race seemed a certainty for him, retributive justice overtook him, and he and his mare were beaten and disgraced, suffering defeat at the hands, or rather the heels, of a three-year-old colt, who, if he keeps sound, is certain in time to make the best hurdle racer in America. He belongs to Mr. JAMES TURNER, of Patterson, and is trained by CHARLES LITTLEFIELD. Only twice before has he started in a hurdle race, and on both occasions he ran very respectably, beating both times his more experienced and older opponent, Bohannon. His owner, discouraged by his double defeat, was anxious to get rid of him, but his splendid performance yesterday has, by materially enhancing his value, induced him to alter his intention. He took his leaps clearly and cleanly, and at the finish had a fine turn of speed left in him, which enabled him to beat the favorite very cleverly, and in remarkably fast time. It is only justice to speak of the admirable jockeyship of HUGH GAFFNEY, who rode the winner in the most artistic style, and with a coolness and judgment that will materially enhance his reputation as a professional rider in races of this description.

The Park Handicap race brought out four runners—General Duke, General Yorke, Hotspur and Sleety. This race was a highly interesting one, and was regarded as lying between the two Generals, for Sleety's mission was evidently to make the running for her stable companion, General Yorke, and Hotspur having been beaten badly by Metairie on the second day of the meeting, was regarded as of no account in this race. General Yorke had on two previous occasions done good service for his party, having twice held of little account in the betting; once at Narragansett Park, where he beat the favorite Fanny Cheatham for the Rhode Island Cup, and more recently at Jerome Park, where he beat Banshee (backed at odds against the field) and two others, for the three-mile Purse race; hence he had a staunch body of supporters who had won on him in his previous races, and now pluckily backed him for the present one. Mr. J. O'DONNELL, the owner of General Duke, had only $500 on him for this race, for he had no confidence in his horse being in fine condition, from his previous having this meeting. The race, as the betting presaged, laid between the two favorites, the pair of Generals, the Duke ultimately winning cleverly, and indorsing the high opinion that turfmen have ever entertained of his racing merits when on fit condition.

The Sequel Stakes for three-year-olds brought out only two of the six entered, Mr. BABCOCK'S Pompey Payne and Mr. PURDY'S Vespucius. The pair had previously run together last Saturday over this course, Vespucius then carrying 7 pounds extra for winning at Jerome Park, but on the present occasion he weighs in at even weights, the advantage Vespucius now enjoyed had no influence on the result, for Pompey Payne, pulling double, fairly galloped away from him, and won in the commonest of canters, proving himself one of the best, if not the best three-year-old in training. This promising son of Vandal and Magnolia, Mr. BABCOCK has got a wonderfully good racehorse, and we prophecy for him a brilliant career on the turf.

The Two-year-old Sweepstakes proved the great feature of the day's racing; resulting in a dead heat between Mr. SANFORD'S and Mr. MCCONNELL'S representatives, both in the name of the—Mr. SANFORD'S b. f. Stamps, by Lexington, dam Mildred; Messrs. MCCONNELL and THOMPSON'S b. f. Lady Petry, by Lexington, out of Ansel's dam; and Mr. F. MORRIS' gr. f. by Eclipse, dam Fidelity. The latter has been beaten by Lady Petry on all appearances, but Mr. MORRIS' filly, at this meeting, and it was rumored that Lady Petry was as good as, if not better than, Ohillicothe; hence, judging by public running, Lady Petry must hold Mr. MORRIS' filly safe. Nothing was known of Mr. SANFORD'S filly, except that she was very good-looking and racing-like, appearance of her subsequently about her that was amply confirmed by the result. She had never been stripped in public before, but her owner evinced his confidence in her by intrusting her with some little money at her quoted pool prices. Getting off badly, she was far behind that her chances seemed hopeless, and the race apparently lay last between Mr. MORRIS' filly and Lady Petry. Half way up the stretch Lady Petry had seemingly the race in hand, but DRISCOLL, who had crept stealthily up unobserved, to the astonishment of the spectators, who almost fancied she had dropped from the clouds, came with a rush like a terrific rush on Mr. SANFORD'S filly that, opposite the grand stand, she fairly collared her, and, after a splendid finish, which was so close that the judges were unable to say which had the best of it, they pronounced it a dead heat. The time was 1:19¾, which was remarkably fast time, considering the weight (97 pounds) carried by the contestants. The deciding heat was run after the Consolation Purse, previous to which the betting was $125 to $100 on Mr. SANFORD'S oddly-named filly, Stamps, but consequent by the defeat in that heat the Uncle Vic colt had such a prejudicial influence on the former that she went back in the betting, and $100 to $80 was current on Lady Petry winning. The race between the two dead-heaters was very exciting, Lady Petry leading to half way up the home stretch, where DRISCOLL challenged with Stamps, had her ladyship safe in a few strides, and won the best two-year-old race ever ran in America by half a length in the same time as the preceding heat—1:19¾. This time, it is true, is not equal to Narragansett's 1:17¾ at the same distance, but it must be remembered that the carrying 10 pounds on that occasion, and the contestants in the present 100 pounds, with the customary three pounds allowance for sex, therefore we are justified in pronouncing this race the best and fastest ever ran in this country. The success of Mr. SANFORD was well received by the assemblage, for the public love to see the popular colors of this straightforward turfman and staunch supporter of racing borne in the front to victory.

The Consolation Purse, one and a half miles, had six horses entered, all of which started. These were Lobelia, the hurdle-racer, (who finding her vocation is not in jumping, commencing her career as a flat racer;) Lancaster, the Saratoga cup winner; Julius and Sarah B., both beaten twice, and deriving the 10 pounds allowance for it; General Duke, who had hardly recovered from the effects of the Park Handicap race, which he won, and the Uncle Vic colt, who had won the Fordham Stakes Handicap, but was not thought worthy of a name until to-day, after he had won the race in question. Lancaster had not run in public since he won the Saratoga Cup, and his prestige was such that odds were bet on his beating the field. The Uncle Vic colt, a wonderfully-good and fast racer, made the running throughout with Julius close to him and Lancaster in attendance. The latter was got in a pocket, and his jockey, not daring to lose too much ground by going around his horses laid behind, intending to make his effort when fairly in the straight run home. But HAYWARD forgot or was ignorant that the home-stretch on Prospect Park is widely different to that of Saratoga—being only one-half the length—and when he called upon his horse for the desired effort, she was shut in going at close quarters, and had to allow Lancaster's fine speed full effect, and he was beaten to the score by half a length, although in the next stride he was ahead of the winner.

THE HURDLE RACE,

over eight hurdles and two miles, for a purse of $600, had four entries—Lobelia, Mitchell, Harry Booth and Bohannon; the two first named only starting. The betting was $100 to $30 on Lobelia, who led over the first two hurdles, when Mitchell collared her, had along side her for the next half mile, and then going in front was never headed, leading over all the remaining hurdles, and winning a most exciting and beautiful race by three lengths, in the fast time of 3:59¾. By this performance Mitchell has established his reputation as the most promising hurdle-racer on the American turf, and great credit is due to his trainer, CHARLES LITTLEFIELD, and his jockey, HUGH GAFFNEY, for their respective services in this race.

FIRST RACE.—Hurdle Race, Handicap Sweepstakes, for all ages; $30 entrance, h. f., $600 added; second horse to receive $100 out of the stakes.

THE PARK HANDICAP,

a sweepstakes of $100 each, half forfeit, with $500 added, had thirteen entered, of which four only started. These were General Yorke, General Duke, Hotspur, and Sleety; the latter being started to make the running for General Yorke. In the pools the Duke sold for $200; Yorke, $155, and the field $115. Sleety made the running for the first mile, with Hotspur in close attendance and the two Generals last, Yorke evidently lying with and watching the Duke. On rounding the turn, GILPATRICK, on General Duke, passed Sleety and Hotspur, and assuming the lead, with General Yorke at his quarters, maintained it throughout, and despite General Yorke's repeated efforts, never again lost it, and won cleverly by a length and a half; GILPATRICK riding in his ancient, masterly style. Hotspur beat Sleety for third place. Time—3:40.

SECOND RACE.—Park Handicap Sweekstakes, for all ages, two miles; $100 entrance, half forfeit, and only $20 if declared; $500 added. Winner of any handicap, after weights are announced, 5 pounds extra; of more than one, 10 pounds extra.

R. W. Walden's b. m. Sleety, 5 years, 112 pounds..... 4
Time—3:40.

THE SEQUEL STAKES,

for three-year-olds, two miles, had only two runners—Pompey Payne and Vespucius. The betting was $100 to $30 on Pompey Payne, who made the running throughout, and won in the commonest of canters, by three lengths, in 3:48¾.

THIRD RACE.—Sequel Stakes, for three-year-olds, two miles; $100 entrance, h. f., $800 added; any winner of a three-year-old race at Jerome Park, or this meeting, 7 pounds extra.

Geo. Cadwallader's b. c. Pompey Payne, by Vandal, dam Magneta, 110 pounds..... 1
Purdy & Withers ch. c. Vespucius, by Planet, dam Columbia, 110 pounds..... 2

THE TWO-YEAR-OLD SWEEPSTAKES,

over three-quarters of a mile, had three starters out of the nine entries. Lady Petry, Stamps and the Fidelity filly, by Eclipse. In pools Lady Petry sold for $200, Fidelity filly $140, and Stamps $110. MORRIS' filly got off first, with Lady Petry close up, and Stamps four lengths behind, being slow at starting. The first quarter was run in 24½ seconds, Lady Petry being half a length behind the gray filly, and SANFORD'S representative four lengths behind, and seemingly out of the race. The second quarter was run in 25 seconds, making the half mile in 49½ seconds, Lady Petry now, leading half a length, and Stamps still behind. Coming up the homestretch, the race seemed at Lady Petry's mercy, but Stamps, unexpectedly coming with a terrific rush collared her at the distance, and after a magnificent finish made a dead heat of it. Time—1:19¾.

The deciding heat was not run until after the last race, but we give it in its regular order. Lady Petry had the call at $100 to $80, for Lancaster's defeat had affected his stable companion for the deciding heat. Stamps was first off, but as they passed the half-mile pole, (the start being from the quarter pole,) Lady Petry was a neck in front, an advantage she held to the three-quarter pole. Coming up the home-stretch Stamps gradually gained and collared her ladyship, who failing to respond to the whip-cord and steel now freely applied, could not shake off her opponent, and Mr. SANFORD'S filly, amid general acclamations, won the race by half a length in 1:19¾—the same time as the preceding heat.

FOURTH RACE.—Sweepstakes for Two-year olds, $100 entrance, h. f., $400 added; three-quarters of a mile; any winner at Jerome Park or this meeting, 5 pounds extra.

M. H. Sanford's b. f. Stamps, by Lexington, dam Mildred, 97 pounds..... 0 1

F. Morris's gr. f. by imported Eclipse, dam Fidelity, 97 pounds..... 3 0
Time—1:19¼; deciding heat, 1:19¼.

THE CONSOLATION PURSE,

one mile and a half, had six runners, Lancaster, Lobelia, General Duke, Uncle Vic colt, Julius and Sarah B. In pools Lancaster sold for $200, Uncle Vic colt $60, General Duke $40, and the field $50. Julius was first off, with Uncle Vic, Lobelia, Lancaster and General Duke in attendance. Coming the three-quarter pole (the start being from the half-mile pole) Uncle Vic colt went in front and never afterward was headed, although Lancaster, who had got pocketed between other horses, made a vigorous effort to reach him in coming up the homestretch, but the colt won the race in 2:43¾. The name of M. H. Sanford, a compliment to the owner of Lancaster, was claimed for the winner.

FIFTH RACE.—Consolation Purse, $400, for all ages, one and one-half miles; horses beaten at this meeting once, allowed 7 pounds; twice, 10 pounds; entrance money to second horse.

Brooklyn Board of Education.

A number of the old members of the Board of Education of the City of Brooklyn, and most of the new ones, held a meeting in the office of the City Assessors at the City Hall on Friday evening, Hon. DEMAS BARNES in the chair. The object of this caucus was to adopt some plan providing for the new members of the Board who take their seats on Tuesday evening next having their rights recognized in the organization of the Board.

The plan resolved upon was as follows: A resolution asking for a reorganization of the Board was adopted. This will be signed as numerously as possible and presented at the outset, immediately after the reading of the minutes. Having thus agreed upon the method of bringing the question before Tuesday's meeting, the next point discussed was that of the chairmanship. One of the members moved that Hon. JOHN W. HUNTER be elected to the position. If this plan proved successful, it would be a guarantee, he said, to the old members that no revolutionary changes were contemplated; and as satisfactory to the new members as it was fair to suppose it would be to the old. The members generally accorded with these views, and Mr. HUNTER was unanimously nominated. He was afterward decided that no changes should be made among the salaried officers. Before the meeting adjourned, several nominations were made for Vice-Chairman, and it is understood that Mr. DANIEL NORTHUP was finally agreed upon.

Another point made with the view of strengthening the plan agreed upon was, that by carrying through such a programme, Dr. THORNE, the present President of the Board, would be relieved the necessity of tendering his resignation, and also absolved from any disgrace by reason of disinclement by a formal vote of the Board. The next meeting of the Board on Tuesday evening promises to be one of unusual interest.

Woman's Aid Society.

The Woman's Aid Society have removed their institution to more commodious and eligible premises, at the foot of Eighty-third-street, East River, where they have secured facilities for largely extending their mission work, by opening a Presbyterian Home for training young girls. An experience, reaching through several years, has fully demonstrated the widely-felt need for such a provision. During the past few years public sympathy and effort have been largely called forth on behalf of the fallen, while little, comparatively, has been done to prevent this terrible evil.

Confining itself in this effort to girls of good moral character, this Society gives them friendly shelter and protection, teaches them the art of dress-making, use of sewing-machines, the rudiments of a plain education, where this has been neglected, together with, if thought, systematic training in household duties, so that they be fitted for the duties they undertake to discharge. Donations may be sent to either of the following officers: Mrs. WM. WALKER, Directress, No. 117 East Twenty-first-street; Mrs. JAMES STUART, Secretary, No. 27 East Thirty-seventh-street; Mrs. J. H. MORTIMER, Treasurer, No. 10 West Thirty-second-street; or to the resident Chaplain, Rev. CYRUS OFFER, foot of Eighty-third-street, East River.

Alleged Rape in the Elysian Fields.

Another alleged outrage on a girl has come to light at Hoboken, and the man who committed it has been arrested. It is stated that about 9:30 o'clock on the night of the 23d of June, the Police of Weehawken were alarmed and awakened out of their drowsy patrol by hearing loud outcries proceeding from an unfrequented part of the woods in the Elysian Fields, Hoboken, and hurrying to the spot, discovered a woman named ELLEN CONNORS lying stretched on the ground in the grasp of one who gave his name as MARTIN CONNORS, who was attempting to commit an outrage on her. MARTIN was at once arrested, and ELLEN detained as a witness. Yesterday ELLEN CONNORS was released on bail provided by JOHN MCWHORTER, of the Board of Chosen Freeholders.

The New-York Bay Ship Company.

The Board of Corporators of this Company met on Friday evening at Newark, Mayor PEDDIE presiding. It is estimated that the cost of excavating the proposed canal from the lower part of Mulberry-street, Newark, to New-York Bay will be $6,000,000. It is proposed to give each subscriber of $5,000 to the enterprise fifty feet of land fronting on the canal, in addition to entitling them to the incidental profits and advantages of the Company.

A DETERMINED RIOT.

A Prisoner Rescued from the Police and the Officers Beaten.

A Citizen Shot Dead and Several Policemen Injured.

About 10:30 o'clock last night, as Officer CAMPBELL, of the Twenty-seventh Precinct, was patroling his post in West-street, near Rector, he noticed a man, whose name is unknown, acting in a very disorderly manner. As the fellow paid no attention to the patrolman's order to keep quiet, Officer CAMPBELL followed him round to Washington-street, where he saw him brutally assault a woman who was sitting in a doorway. Finding that the man was determined to continue his outrageous conduct, the officer took him in custody, but succeeded in progressing with his prisoner only a few rods, when he was suddenly attacked by a crowd of infuriated men and women, who issued from the tenement-house No. 75 Washington-street. This crowd numbered over one hundred, and they freely used clubs, stones and other missiles in their onslaught upon the officer. Scarcely had the disturbance begun, than Officer TOHER, of the same precinct, on whose post the affair occurred, ran up to the assistance of his brother officer. He also was met by a shower of stones, and severely wounded on the head, face and neck before the riot could be quelled. Officer CAMPBELL had his uniform torn nearly off his person and sustained several contusions on the body by being hit with clubs and stones. While Officer TOHER was gallantly fighting his way through the mob, Officer CAMPBELL felt himself being overpowered by numbers, when he drew his revolver and fired twice at his assailants, one of the bullets taking effect in the body of RICHARD LONG, near the stomach, causing a fatal wound. The crowd of men and women succeeded, however, in rescuing the prisone in Officer CAMPBELL'S custody, and he was not recaptured. When the row was at its height, the alarm was given at the Station-house in Liberty-street, when Roundsman OATES started for the scene with the reserve, numbering some eight or ten officers. As they reached the scene of hostilities, these officers were met by a shower of stones, several of them being injured by the flying missiles. Roundsman OATES soon succeeded in rescuing Officers CAMPBELL and TOHER from the clutches of the mob, when the entire Police force retreated toward the Station-house, carrying with them the man LONG, who was found on the sidewalk in an insensible condition. The mob followed the Police, and vented their rage by several more showers of stones. As soon as the wounded man had been carried into the Station-house, Dr. ARMSTRONG, of the Central Office, was summoned through the telegraph, and he, on his arrival, ordered the man to be immediately removed to the hospital. As the case was an urgent one, the order for an ambulance from Bellevue Hospital was countermanded, and LONG was carried to the New-York Hospital on a stretcher, where he died at 1 o'clock this morning.

While the necessary examination was going on, the Station-house doors were besieged by an immense gathering of excited men and women, who vented their rage in curses and threats against the Police. The latter were compelled to make frequent sallies before they succeeded in driving these people away, in one of which Officer TOHER succeeded in arresting MARY LOWERY, whom he recognized as one of the leaders in the assault upon himself and Officer CAMPBELL. This woman was subsequently locked up for examination to-day before Justice HOGAN at the Tombs Police Court. Naturally enough the row occasioned considerable excitement in the First Ward, as it was believed that several persons had been killed by the shots. Both Officers CAMPBELL and TOHER seem to have acted with discretion, and the pistol would not have been resorted to by CAMPBELL had he not considered his life in danger.

Serious Stabbing Affray in the First Ward.

A few minutes before 10 o'clock last night, a painter named ROBERT ROBERTS and his wife ANN quarreled with MARY ANN MCCLOSKEY and ROSANNA HORN, in the tenement-house No. 6 Carlisle-street. During the fracas which ensued, ROSANNA HORN seized an iron pot and struck ROBERTS on the head with the improvised weapon, inflicting a severe and dangerous wound. ROBERTS then drew a knife, saw the outlines of two persons, and then I knew what one was on a reef, shoal or rock. After some considerable delay I got my lamp lit, and dressing myself with dispatch, ran back to the cabin to quiet the passengers. There I found all in confusion and dismay—everybody up, dressed, and their arms full of valuables. Ladies' jewelry, pet birds, monkeys and every possible article of value or curiosity which they fancied they might save with themselves, from what they in their fright and consternation imagined to be swift and terrible disaster.

My entrée was the signal for a thousand questions. "Oh, Doctor, where are we? Are we on fire? Is the ship sinking? Do you think we are lost? What can we do to be saved? Can you order the sailors to take us right away?" And so they clamored—men, women and children. When they had finished their exclamatory interrogatories, I said: "Be seated, all of you, and endeavor to control your undue excitement and unnecessary alarm. There is no danger, I assure you. The vessel is on a sandbar, and in an hour, I believe, we will be on our way again rejoicing." Upon being thus reassured they became more calm, and I went forward. Day was breaking, and when I reached the forecastle I looked over and saw that the prow of the gallant Mississippi was nestling in a pile of rocks, which each moment, as the tide fell, (we went on at the full,) showed higher and higher, uglier and uglier their rugged tops. At 4 o'clock daylight and low tide showed us plainly where we were.

"Breakers to the right of us,
Breakers to the left of us
Rolled and thundered."

The island was plainly developed, and proved us to be on the south side of Martinique instead of St. Lucia, and hard and fast on Pesonnelle Reefs.

Soon we saw coming from a distant point a small sail boat heading for us. Each moment another and another showed themselves along the coast of the island. In an hour we had a small fleet of the little bateaux alongside. The first man to come on board was a little, superannuated, dried-up, ancient creole, who, attired in a fantastic, or rather, conglomerated costume—half aboriginal, half military—told us in pigeon English "dat he wus de gov'ment pilate." I received him in a manner which I thought his appearance, and address and appellation demanded; expressed our supreme delight to see him on our deck, and ushered him as a person of distinguished consideration and importance into the presence of the Captain. Then and there, through the medium of an interpreter, he went through an enfilading fire of interrogatories, name of the reef, kind of bottom, time and height of tide, possibility of assistance from the island. In answer to these several questions he said—Pesonnelle Reef, coral bottom, high tide, 4 P. M., and rise 2½ feet. That there were steamers at Fort de France on the north side of the island. A consultation was then held, at which it was determined to dispatch a messenger to land to ascertain the truthfulness of Signor —, our Para agent, who was a passenger, speaking French, volunteered to go. He left us at 6 A. M. At 10 A. M. the Captain concluded to try and lighten the ship by throwing over coffee and coal, and immediately all hands were put to work, and for several hours out of both holes the coffee went, and every time a full sack sunk in in the sea it was a $20 gold piece gone. At 2 P. M. 2,000 sacks had disappeared, and forty tons of coal. High tide came and went and no change. An anchor had been put out astern at 9 A. M., and the engineer's and stewards' men had been heaving on a large hawser attached to it, but it made no appreciable effect on the ship.

At 8 A. M., the ladies and children had been sent on shore in the longboat, and were left comfortably situated at the house of the Mayor of the province. The passengers who remained devoted themselves to lightening the ship the day, but, as night drew on and the ship seemed to labor more and cramp harder on the rocks, they began to show symptoms of uneasiness, and finally set to passage for the shore. At 7 P. M. the Commissary of Marine, or Captain of the Coast Guard, came off, attended by his orderly, in grand style. We gave him a detailed account of the accident, &c. He immediately dispatched letters to the Governor, the General commanding the forces and the French naval commander at Fort de France, for assistance, and promised us that we should have efficient and prompt aid. How we passed the night I shall never forget. The great ship, with 14,000 bags of coffee in her, would be lifted by the sea, and then fall upon the rocks with a weight and force that possibly may be imagined. Dishes, glass, table ornaments, decanters, mirrors, &c., were crashing and breaking every moment; and it seemed that each succeeding blow on the bottom would burst a hole in the hull.

At 3 o'clock the crew were called again to heave on the hawser, and at 6 o'clock, upon sounding the pumps it was found that the ship was making water, but not in great quantity. Since the time she struck the engines had been working full power reversed, and now the steam pumps were put in service. At 8 A. M., the water increasing, the hand pumps were manned. At 10 A. M., we descried a steamer coming around the south point of the island, which we knew was aid for us from Fort de France. She came in a long sweep toward us, and we saw she was the French mail boat. Again we see black smoke over the South Cape, and soon another steamer develops itself on the horizon. How our hearts leapt within us. Here was aid, indeed—two powerful steamers to pull and tug at us. At 11 A. M. they are within hawser distance on either side—the mail steamer and the French man-of-war Ascheron. We are getting ready to pass the cables, when the engineer reports that the water is increasing rapidly, his pumps cannot free her; in short the ship is filling! No use for cables now. The noble Mississippi, after a long and agonising struggle, has yielded up the ghost—is dead! and we must leave her to rot and disappear on the cruel rocks of Pesonnelle. Then came the order, "Get passengers and baggage off to the steamer, and commence to wreck the ship." And then it began—men in the hold at cargo, men in the cabins at furniture, men in the saloon at fixtures. The sound of hammers, axes, saws, &c., the cry of different orders, the Babel of a tongue which few of us understood, the Creole French for the ship now was full of the natives from the shore—all day long the work went on; at night there had been destroyed property which had cost thousands of dollars or months of time. All day long the side of the vessel had been covered with a thousand different articles, as they were lowered into the boats that lay alongside, to transport them to the steamers lying by.

On the second day the mail steamer left us, loaded with passengers, crew, cargo, fixtures, stores, furniture, &c. The man-of-war remained until the 16th, and she left full; and then the Mississippi looked forlorn indeed. But few of the crew remained, and they, worn out and sick, longed to get away. We continued to work at the cargo and ship until the 17th, when the greater part of the crew demanded to be allowed to go home. The Captain called for volunteers. The second assistant engineer, second officer and myself and ten men stepped out. Then the freed men, like liberated prisoners, crowded pell mell into the boats, made the shore and started—like frightened sheep on a run—through the night for the other side of the island and to Fort de France. Sailors are but little children, if you but for a moment interrupt their regular duties of life.

On the 20th (Monday) we went off to the ship to commence work as usual, but as soon as we struck the deck we found that the whole ship was filled with gas—the result of the decomposition of the coffee—and, after fighting it for a couple of hours, we gave it up; and gathering together the few traps we still had on board, we lowered the remaining ship's boats, and shoved off and sadly rowed away—leaving the vessel to the mercy of the winds and waves.

The next day we evacuated the island, remained at Francois over night, crossed the island on the 22d, and arrived here at nightfall. Since then all the crew, except the Captain and myself, have gone home. We are living very pleasantly in the country, five miles from the town, and have a whole house to ourselves, servants, horses, &c., and, in fact, feel quite comfortable, for shipwrecked men.

I have been selling coffee and stores at auction for several days past; will finish to-day, and then will lay by for instructions from the Company in New-York.

A SAD LIFE HISTORY.

A Betrayed Young Girl Dies by Poison in St. Louis.

From the St. Louis Dispatch, June 30.

NELLIE VAN ROY, a lost girl, and an inmate of JENNIE HALL'S house of ill repute, on Green-street, committed suicide last evening, between 7 and 8 o'clock, by taking a large dose of arsenic. Suicide among this class of people is not an unfrequent occurrence, but there are circumstances attending the life and death of this unhappy girl which single her out from the crowd of her companions, and give her history such a coloring as is seldom found in the career of such people.

NELLIE VAN ROY (an assumed name) was born of respectable parents in Jackson County, and at the time of her death was not quite 19 years of age. She was unusually talented, and, having received a good education, was destined by nature for a place of honor and respectability, above the common herd. Only three years and a half ago she became acquainted with a man, one of whose many aliases is McGuire, and who is known to the Police here as CHARLES EPP, and who, it appears, is a desperate and disreputable character—he is said to have murdered men in his day—and is at present either in the jail at Chicago, or in the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill. This man called to see her at her home in Jackson County, and, by his wiles and intrigues, soon gained her confidence and love. Her parents, who, doubtless, had heard of the bad character of the man, forbade her to receive anything of good she offered, and to have become a wild, ungovernable fury, with every passion allowed full play, without restraint of any kind. When she found it was an outlaw and a villain she had married, and heard that he had another wife living; that her companions were thieves and disreputable characters, she sank in disgust, and abandoned every thought of virtue.

She lived for a while with her husband in Illinois. The officers of the law were after him, and once she fired at a man who was attempting to arrest him. For this she was arrested and sent to the penitentiary for two years, but served out her time. She soon after came to St. Louis, and entered upon a life of sin. She grew to hate, with an intense hatred, the man whom she had married, and after her release never lived with him. Last Winter she is reported to have twice fired at him, with the intention of killing him.

Among her associates here she was well liked. They describe her as a person of few words, retired in her manner, but with a revengeful thought always lurking within her. She spent most of her time reading, writing and composing poetry, and in her trunk this morning were found about 200 pieces of her letters and effusions of poetry, all of which show that she was well read and carefully educated. The following letter is a fair specimen of her ability, and contains not only a sketch of her life, but also a moral that should impress all whom thoughtlessness may allow to fall into temptation. It was written to a man named EDWARD NEWSON, who at the time was a prisoner for some offence.

SATURDAY NOON, March 13, 1869.—MY DARLING EDWIN: How glad, very glad I was to receive your loving letter; now, ED., we will just drop all foolishness and sin more. Do you thought me too good for such a life; ah, pet, that time was, but is no more. I've striven hard to crush an accusing conscience and attain my present eminence. I can now laugh at verdancy with the best of you, Ed., my only failing or weakness at present is my devotion to yourself, and on your account I have taken up my habitation in Green-street. Other quarters got too warm for me; am I not of a sacrificing temperament? and most lovers would get tired of me, and so will you in time. Ah! Ed, I am inclined to think you are putting too much value upon yourself. Let that be as it may, only think enough of yourself, and me, too, hereafter. You will find me a faithful servant, if you are rather dismayed at my attachment to cold steel, as you term it.

The cold steel will never go back on you, nor interfere with your domestic bliss in the least, so don't distress yourself, I beg of you. I will try to visit you again soon, if I could only be certain that my visits were as agreeable to you as you pretend they are. Have you any idea in the least when your fate and mine is to be decided? It seems to me your trial is unnecessarily long; be it long or short, you will always find your humble servant anxious and rejoiced to see you.

MCGUIRE won't trouble us any more, anyways soon; he thinks I'm too much for him. My curses follow him as continually and constant as my blessings and love hover around you, dear EDWIN. Why has he made me the thing I am?

When I look back upon the various changes of my existence, should the wreck of what I was once pure and good; when I think of the time, only three short years ago, when my life's young blood ran high, when I was happy, so happy, in loving and believing myself loved by a man who had it in his power to advance my future interest and make me a woman of truth and virtue, one to be loved and respected; but how has he used his power? By making me the guilty thing I am. He has sent my fond hopes to the ground, thrust me in the midst of vice and infamy, led me where I shuddered to walk, placed the wine cup to my lips and bade me drink. I was then but 16 years old. He called me green, foolish—a child, and said he would educate me, which he has done—yes, which he has done, and at what a cost have I served him. I have sold my hopes of Heaven for a shade. He has made my life a curse to me; oh, I have drained the cup of bitterness to the dregs, and now, behold the consequence. You see in reckless HELL a proof of what might have been, and then its reverse. But I will have my revenge. What care I though confidence be betrayed through me? So have mine been betrayed, though hearts may bleed, my head ache, though I may be driven, as one day be wrecked, so has mine been seared and chilled. Some one shall pay for my lost happiness. Why not the world? Must I, who have such a keen appreciation of the good and beautiful, who have such sense of what is pure and lofty, see others revel in their midst, and myself an outcast? No, never. I will yet enjoy all this, though it has lost me my honor and may eventually cost me my life. Darling EDWIN, please write soon again, very soon, to your own loving NELL.

Our space will not allow us to publish any more of her letters, or any of her poetical compositions, but the above is a fair sample of her ability.

Last night she was sitting in the parlor, musing, and one of her companions asked her what she was thinking of. She replied she was thinking of suicide. One of the girls a little while after asked her to come and get her picture taken. She said she would go, but that they would have to carry her back in an ambulance. About 7:30 she fell from the sofa to the floor, and commenced writhing in agony. A physician was summoned, but as he could do nothing for her, and thought she had taken a dose of strychnine. She died on the floor about half an hour after taking the poison. She had previously given away her pocket-book and some trinkets, and asked to be buried with the ring on her finger which she then wore.

Her step-father, mother and brother reside in this city, and are all respectable people. The mother did not know she was leading the life she did, and the first she heard of it was when she was summoned last night to see the corpse. Her tears and lamentations are described as most heart-rending, and forced all who saw her, depraved as they were, to weep. The unhappy mother begged those around not to tell the girl's true name; that she was an only daughter, and if her death were known it would bring disgrace upon her many friends. She left the body where she found it, and it will be buried at 2 o'clock this afternoon by JENNIE HALL and her companions.

She was a good-looking girl and always enjoyed good health. She appeared to despise the life she led, and some time ago, having met a friend on the street who knew her when she was an innocent girl, she said she worked in a bonnet store on Fourth-street. An inquest was held upon her, and the Coroner was of the opinion that it was arsenic she had taken. He pronounced it a case of deliberate and premeditated suicide. Such is the sad history of three brief years—a wife at 15, and filling the grave of a suicide to-day.

Gilmore Called Upon to Come Home.

From the Milwaukee Wisconsin, July 1.

It takes a Milwaukee boy to do a huge thing in a satisfactory manner, and make a success of it. People who did not know that GILMORE was a Milwaukean may have had fears, but in this city where he was known so well, no doubt whatever was felt that GILL, as he was always called, would make the Peace Jubilee a thing never to be forgotten. When GIL. bid good-bye to his relatives here and was about setting out to try his fortune in the world, a friend said, "Good luck to you, GILL. I suppose we shall see you back in a few days." GILMORE drew himself up, as he knows how to, and replied, "You will see me back to Milwaukee when I have a pocket full of rocks, and have done something to make the world respect PAT. GILMORE." His friend said, "Ah, GIL., you are over sanguine," and while he hoped for much in the boy, he did not expect so much as we have seen in the great Peace Jubilee.

Besides making a sensation that will last him a lifetime, GILMORE has made money, and has now "that pocket full of rocks." Having done so well—having realized more than his highest expectations—having done something to make the world respect him—and having a pocket full of rocks—we say now, GILMORE, come home.
